As night was now approaching, the Protector caused a retreat to be sounded, and the victorious army mustered again at Edmonston Edge, half a mile from Musselburgh, where the Scottish camp stood. Here they gave a great shout ‘in sign of gladness and victory,’ which was so loud and shrill that, as they afterwards learned, it was heard in the streets of Edinburgh. They then proceeded to plunder the tents of the enemy, which, according to Patten, occupied a space about a mile in compass. The description which he gives of the Scottish mode of encamping is exceedingly interesting: “As they had no pavilions, or Scottish mode of round-houses,” he says, “of any commendable compass, so were there few other tents with posts, as the used manner of making is; and of these few also none of above twenty foot length, but most far under; for the most part all sumptuously beset (after their fashion), for the love of France, with fleur de lys, some of blue buckram, some of black, and some of some other colours. These white ridges (as I called them), that as we stood on Fawside Brae did make so great muster towards us, which I did take then to be a number of tents, when we came we found it a linen drapery, of the coarser cambrick indeed, for it was all of canvas sheets, and were the tenticles, or rather cabins and couches of their soldiers, the which (much after the common building of their country beside) they had formed of four sticks, about an ell long a piece, whereof two fastened together at one end aloft, and the two ends beneath stiecked in the ground an ell asunder, standing in fashion like the bow of a sow’s yoke; over two such bows, one, as it were at their head, the other at their feet, they stretched a sheet down on both sides, whereby their cabin became roofed like a ridge;* but scant shut at both ends, and not very close beneath on the sides, unless their sticks were the shorter, or their wives the more liberal to lend them larger drapery; howbeit, within they had lined them and stuffed them so thick with straw, that although the weather was very cold, when they were once couched they were as warm as they had been wrapped in horse-dung.” With regard to the spoil of the camp, Patten states that Plunder of the there was found in the tents good provision of white bread, ale, oaten cakes, oatmeal, mutton, butter in pots, and cheese; and also in those of the principal persons, good wine and some silver plate. The English next fell to stripping the bodies of the slain. As many hands make light work, observes the judge-marshal, it was a wonder to see in how short a time all the bodies were stript stark naked throughout the whole space over which the pursuit and slaughter had extended. He expresses great admiration of the athletic forms of the Scottish soldiers. Their tallness of stature, clearness of skin, bigness of bone, and due proportion in all parts, he says, were such that, unless he had seen them, he would not have believed the whole country had contained so many well-made men. An immense quantity of armour and weapons fell into the hands of the victors. Many articles were left on the ground, 'which they would not vouchsafe to give carriage for;' but upwards of thirty thousand jacks (coats of mail) and swords, together with thirty pieces of ordnance, were sent by ship to England. Thus ended the fatal battle of Pinkie (so called from its being fought on the fields adjacent to the old mansion of Pinkie House*), one of the most disastrous defeats the Scots have ever sustained. It was fought on the 10th September, 1547.

The battle of Pinkie was not followed up by any comprehensive or vigorous movements on the part of the victors. It was within Somerset's power to have marched upon Stirling Castle, the garrison of which, though defending the person of their infant sovereign, and increased by the forces of the fugitives from Pinkie, could not have held out against his forces. He might also have occupied and strengthened such commanding positions as Edinburgh, and the town and harbour of Leith, and have afterwards made a progress through the country to compel the dismayed inhabitants to submit to his authority, in return for forbearance and protection. It was fortunate for the cause of Scottish independence that Somerset had neither the leisure, nor the firmness of mind, requisite to mature and execute such a scheme of conquest. Amidst the rejoicings over the victory just gained, he was apprized of the formation of a formidable conspiracy in England against his authority. The maintenance of the supreme dignity to which he had been raised in his own country, was more desirable than a successful prosecution of his Scottish campaign, and he decided on returning with all haste to the English court, that he might crush the plots which had there arisen during his short absence. This abrupt departure only gave him the opportunity and means of indulging in useless ravages and cruelties, which resembled rather the termination of a border inroad, than the operations of a victorious general who aims at completing the subjugation of the vanquished. Wiser far would it have been to have made a quiet retreat, and to have refrained from irritating a people with whom, before the object of English ambition could be attained, either negotiations or hostilities must be tried anew. The measures which Somerset now took, before withdrawing from Scotland, were only calculated to increase the hatred of the nation towards the victorious invaders. Quitting Edge-buckling Brae, where he had encamped after the battle, he marched to Leith, quartered his cavalry in that town, and ravaged the surrounding districts. Here he received the submission of the Earl of Bothwell, whom Arran had liberated after the battle; * and then proceeded to burn Kinghorn and several small fishing harbours on the coast of Fife, and to put a garrison in the deserted monastery of Incheolm, a petty island in the Forth. Failing, for want of time, in an attempt to reduce the castle and destroy the town of Edinburgh, he wreaked his vengeance upon the abbey of Holyrood, which he plundered and stripped of its leaden roof. After concluding a week's irregular havoc, by devoting Leith to the flames, he commenced his retreat on the 18th of September, 1547.† The fleet which had accompanied him set sail at the same time, and in its homeward voyage, through the treachery of Lord Gray, obtained possession of the castle of Broughty, which was now fortified anew and garrisoned with an English force.‡ In his march home through the Merse and Teviotdale, the Protector compelled many of the leading barons of those districts to swear allegiance to the English king, and to surrender to him their strongholds. Some of these places of strength he demolished, others he garrisoned and increased their fortifications. He placed two hundred men in the strong castle of Home, under the command of Sir Edward Dudley, and built a new fort upon the site of the old castle of Roxburgh, which he intrusted to Sir Ralph Bulmer with a garrison of three hundred soldiers.

The defeat at Pinkie was not the only disaster which Scotland suffered at this Inroad of Wharton. period. Two days before the battle, Lord Wharton and the Earl of Lennox entered the West Marches at the head of an army of five thousand men, and laid waste the whole country with fire and sword. In this destructive inroad the stronghold of Castlemilk was taken and garrisoned by the English; the town of Annan was completely destroyed, and the church and steeple were blown up, after a desperate resistance on the part of the Master of Maxwell, the Lairds of Johnston and Cockpool, and a brave officer named Lyon, who were permitted, however, to retire with their lives. Such was the terror which these proceedings infused into the Annandale Borders, that they immediately gave in their submission to the English leaders, and swore allegiance to King Edward.§

This rough mode of wooing, however, served only to exasperate the Scottish people and to alienate their minds still farther from the alliance with England. Meanwhile, prompt Energetic conduct of the Queen-mother. and vigorous measures were adopted by the Queen-mother, and the patriotic portion of the nobles, to sustain the spirit of the people and to preserve the independence of the country. The infant-queen, for the sake of security, was removed from Stirling to the priory of Inchmahome, situated on a little isle in the Lake of Menteith, where she remained along with her mother and her governors, Lords Erskine and Livingston, during the remainder of the month of September. A proclamation was made throughout the country for the levy of a new army, to expel the enemies who were waging such savage war against a free people, for the purpose of compelling them to enter into a pacific matrimonial alliance; and a considerable body of troops were assembled, who skirmished around the camp of the English, cut off their foragers and stragglers, and rendered it exceedingly unsafe for any of the soldiers to stray far from the main body during their retreat.*

As soon as Somerset had returned to England, a convention of the Scottish nobles was summoned by the Governor to meet at Stirling. It was attended by the Queen-dowager and a number of the leading barons, who were addressed by Arran in an animated speech, urging them to continue the war and to fight to the last, rather than surrender their youthful sovereign, and the independence of their country, to their haughty enemies. These sentiments were loudly applauded, and it was ultimately determined to provide for the personal safety of the queen by sending her to complete her education in France. This proposal was cordially welcomed by D'Ossell, the French ambassador, who assured the Scottish nobles of the affection of his master, and his determination to maintain the ancient alliance between the two countries. The Queen-mother, perceiving the favourable impression which this declaration had produced, dexterously hinted that the Dauphin would be a more suitable consort for their young queen than the English king, whose pretensions to her hand had been supported with such violence and barbarity. The suggestion was favourably received by the council, and the Scottish ambassadors, who were at this time despatched to solicit the assistance of the French court, were commissioned to sound the inclinations of Henry II. in regard to the match; and he, as might have been expected, received the overture with rapture.†

The war with England still raged, and it became evident that Scotland, deserted and betrayed by the multitudes of her leading nobles, would be unable to continue the contest unless assisted by her ancient ally, France. The Earls of Angus, Cassillis, Lennox, and Glencairn, the Lords Gray, Boyd, Maxwell, and Cranstoun, with many other barons, shamefully deserted the cause of their country and espoused the English interest. The veteran traitor, Sir George Douglas, not only signed certain secret articles which bound him to serve against his native land, in the event of the queen's marriage to any other person than Edward VI., but also communicated to the Protector

a 'device' or plan for the invasion and subjugation of Scotland, which, however, was rejected, from a well-founded suspicion that the venal and corrupt baron was not acting in good faith.* Argyle, a supporter of the Reformation, and one of the ablest and most powerful of the Scottish nobles, had collected an army of Highlandmen, for the purpose of capturing the castle of Broughty and expelling the enemy from the neighbouring district; but he, too, was gained over to the English interest, partly by skilfully playing off against him his great rival Huntly, and partly by a bribe of one thousand crowns. Even Huntly, the pillar of the Romish party (who, it will be recollected, was taken prisoner at the battle of Pinkie), promised that, if allowed to return home, he would join the English faction and promote the views of King Edward.† In the midst of such baseness, treachery, and selfishness, on the part of those who were her natural defenders, it is matter of astonishment that the independence of Scotland was not entirely destroyed. The Protector, Somerset, still pertinaciously adhered to the long-cherished project of the English court, but perceiving that a great error had been committed in attempting to compel the Scots by force to agree to an alliance with England, he now tried a more conciliatory policy, and, on the 5th of February, 1547-8, addressed a letter to the Governor and lords of the council, in which he disclaimed all views of conquest, and declared that his only object was to unite the two kingdoms upon a footing of perfect equality. A form of prayer for the accomplishment of a peaceful union between England and Scotland, by the marriage of King Edward with the Scottish queen, was also drawn up about this time, and appointed to be read in all the churches.‡ But these attempts at conciliation came too late, and Somerset, finding that the Scots were inveterately hostile to the alliance with England, caused the war to be renewed with all its former cruelty and barbarity. On the 18th of February, the English Warden, Inroad of Wharton Lord Wharton, in conjunction with and Lennox.

the Earl of Lennox, who commanded a band of 'assured' Borderers, invaded the Western Marches, expecting to be joined, according to agreement, by the Earl of Angus and the Master of Maxwell, at the head of their numerous retainers. Neither promises nor oaths, however, could bind these men, in whom Wharton found, to use his own expressive language, 'an accustomed fashion of untruth.' Enraged at their violation of their engagements, the English leader proceeded to lay waste and plunder the country, but having incautiously divided his army, which consisted of three thousand men, and separated the cavalry from the infantry, he was attacked in the midst of a wild and difficult country by the Earl of Angus, and entirely routed. The assured Borderers as at Penielheugh, when they saw the day going against their allies, threw away their red crosses and slaughtered the English fugitives without mercy.* The Warden himself with great difficulty escaped with the remnant of his force to Carlisle. Inroad of Lord body of troops, invaded the Eastern Marches, laid waste the country nearly to the walls of Edinburgh, burned Dalkeith and Musselburgh, surprised and fortified Lauder and Haddington, and placed in the last of these towns a powerful garrison, composed partly of English troops and partly of foreign mercenaries.‡ The castle of Dalkeith, the stronghold of Sir George Douglas, was captured by means of a dexterous stratagem of the English leader, who succeeded in completely outwitting the veteran intriguer. He himself narrowly escaped, leaving his wife, his eldest son, afterwards Regent Morton, the Abbot of Arbroath, the Laird of Wedderburn, and many others of his friends in the hands of the enemy, together with a great store of money and moveables; as, according to Grey's account, "all the country had brought their goods together, thinking that nothing could prevail against George's policy."§

The state of Scotland at this period, devastated Miserable state of by famine, pestilence, intestine dis- the country. visions, and the sword, was deplorable in the extreme. The inhabitants of Angus and Fife suffered severely from the spoliations of the crews of the English ships which lay in the Frith of Tay, between Broughty Castle and Dundee; so that, as Pitseottie informs us, the barons and gentlemen of Fife were under the necessity of keeping up a nightly watch for safety of their goods and gear.|| A fruitless attempt was made by the Governor to capture the castle of Broughty, and his efforts to dislodge the enemy from the strongholds of Incheith and Haddington were equally unsuccessful. The citizens of Dundee, who had cordially embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, declared for England, and offered to hold their town against all the efforts of the Governor.¶ Many of the Scottish barons had already given in their adherence to the Protector, and the number of these venal traitors increased so largely that six thousand men pledged themselves to join

Wharton in his invasion of the country, and gave hostages for their fidelity. In this extremity, when the people were almost reduced to ^{Arrival of the} despair, a French fleet appeared in ^{French} the Frith of Forth, bringing men, ^{artilleries.} money, and food for the starving population; and, on the 16th of June, six thousand troops, including three thousand Germans, under their native prince the Rhinegrave, and a body of Italians, led by Leo Strozzi, landed at Leith. They brought with them a powerful train of artillery, and were commanded by Andrew de Montelembert Sieur d'Esse, an officer of brilliant talents and great experience, who was invested with full powers to complete the matrimonial treaty between the Dauphin and the Scottish queen.

The French auxiliaries were speedily joined by the Governor, with a force of five thousand men, and the united armies soon after proceeded to invest the town of Haddington.* But the garrison held out with such determination that the siege was first changed into a blockade, and then finally raised on the approach of the Earl of Shrewsbury, at the head of a large force, consisting of nearly twenty-two thousand men. Considerable success, however, had attended the Scottish arms. An escort of one thousand five hundred English horse, conducting a supply of ammunition, were encountered and defeated with great loss. A fleet appeared in the Forth, commanded by Lord Clinton, and a force was disembarked at St. Monance, in Fife, but it was encountered and almost totally cut off by the Laird of Wemyss and the Lord James, afterwards the famous Regent Moray, then a youth in his seventeenth year, who, with a wonderful promptitude, had assembled the people of the district and hurried to the coast. The English, to the number of twelve hundred, were drawn up in good order, and at first were successful in repulsing their opponents, but an impetuous charge from the Lord James changed the fortunes of the day and decided the victory. The slaughter was great, many falling in the contest, others being drowned in their unavailing efforts to reach their ships. On the other hand, serious losses were experienced by the Regent. A fort was erected at Broughty Craig, for the purpose of over-awing the country; another was commenced at Dunclas, where three thousand Germans were encamped to carry on the work; Dundee was taken, and Dunbar burnt to the ground.

Whilst Haddington continued to be invested by the Regent, a parliament assembled ^{Meeting of the} on the 17th of July, in the abbey ^{parliament.} adjoining the town. On this occasion, Monsieur d'Esse, commander of the foreign troops, appeared as commissioner from the French monarch, for the purpose of laying before the three Estates proposals for a union between his son, the Dauphin, and the youthful queen. Assuring them of his master's sympathy in their patriotic struggles against England, he promised them large assistance in the way of troops and money, engaging they should want for nothing that was necessary for the energetic prosecution of the war. In conclusion, he expressed the anxiety which his master felt that this marriage should be consummated, and the two countries united more firmly than they had hitherto been by the leagues and treaties which had subsisted for centuries. If these his proposals were agreed to, he requested that the Scottish queen should be intrusted to his care, and educated at the expense of France. In the debate which followed much diversity of opinion was exhibited. Some protested that inevitable calamities would attend on the removal of the queen; and that such a marriage involved, among other consequences, slavery to France, and a perpetual war with England. It was their opinion that the offer of the Protector's friendship should be at once embraced, as thereby, without any further embarrassing stipulations, a peace would be secured to the nation for a period of at least ten years. Naturally the French interest was favoured by the Roman Catholics, who contended for the policy and expediency of the proposed union. By a majority of the parliament, the matter was decided according to the wishes of the French monarch, on the understanding that the liberties and independence of the kingdom were to be sacredly preserved. The departure of the queen being at the same time resolved upon, measures were taken to secure the safety of her passage to the French court. It was ascertained that the English would make every effort to intercept her, and stratagem was resorted to in order to defeat their designs. The fleet which was intended to convey the youthful queen to her new kingdom having sailed from Leith, apparently with the purpose of proceeding to France, altered its course on clearing the Forth, and passing round the north of Scotland, through the Pentland Firth, entered the mouth of the Clyde, and arrived without accident at Dunbarton, to which place Mary had, some time previously, been removed, in anticipation of this event. Here she embarked on board the royal galley, along with her four Mariés, who were selected from the families of Fleming, Beaton, Seton, and Livingston, to be her companions and playmates.* She was accompanied also by her governors, Lords Erskine and Livingston, her two preceptors, the Abbot of Inchmahale and the parson of Balmaclellan, her three natural brothers, the Lord James, Prior of St. Andrew's, Lord John, Commendator of Holyrood, and Lord Robert, Prior of Orkney, and about a hundred attendants of both sexes and mostly of noble birth. An eye-witness of the embarkation states that "the young queen was at that time one of the most perfect creatures the God of nature ever formed, for that her equal was nowhere to be found, nor had the world another child of her fortune and hopes."† She fortunately escaped the efforts which were made for her capture, and reached the French shores in safety on the 13th of August, 1548. It has generally been supposed that Mary landed at Brest, but it appears that, after beating about for thirteen days on the coast of Brittany, the French admiral was forced, by stress of weather, to run into the little port of Roscoff, at that time a nest of pirates and smugglers.‡ On the 20th of August the Scottish Queen and her train The arrival of arrived at Morlaix, and from thence Mary in France. proceeding to the palace of St. Germain, she was received by Henry with every demonstration of respect and affection, and a court and household were arranged for her, with due consideration for her exalted rank.

* These young ladies, celebrated in tradition and song as the Queen's Mariés, were Mary Livingston, youngest daughter of Alexander, fifth Lord Livingston, Mary Fleming, daughter of Lord Fleming, and the illegitimate daughter of James IV., Mary Seton, daughter of Lord Seton, and Mary Beaton, daughter of Beaton of Balfour, in Fife. They received precisely the same education as their royal mistress, being instructed in whatever she was taught, and by the same masters. The exquisite ballad of 'the Queen's Marie,' commemorates the crimes and the melancholy fate of one of these ladies. (See Sir Walter Scott's "Border Minstrelsy," vol. iii. p. 298.)

CHAPTER XXVII.

MARY.

A.D. 1548—1561.

[IMMEDIATELY after the arrival of the Scottish queen in France, Henry directed his ambassador to intimate to the Protector, that as the father of the affianced husband of the queen, he had extended his friendship to Scotland, and required that the latter country should be included in his treaty with England, and that all hostilities should be brought to a conclusion. These representations, however, were not attended with success. Both parties carried on the war with unabated vigour

Progress of the war. and undisguised animosity. It was characterised at this period by a ferocity almost without parallel in the history of the respective countries.* The sufferings of the Scottish people had been extreme, and they now retaliated on the English in the fiercest spirit of revenge. Their disasters had been many and fatal. On the field of Pinkie the flower of their nation had perished; their country had been ravaged; their shipping destroyed; their harvests ruined; their Borders had been the scene of repeated invasions, cruel plunderings, and pitiless massacres. These excesses could neither be at once forgotten, nor easily forgiven.

On the departure of Shrewsbury for England, the cause he had so successfully promoted was materially endangered by a series of disasters, which followed close upon each other. In many parts of the country the inhabitants had submitted to the English, merely out of fear of the consequences of resistance. The arrival of the French excited them to immediate revolt, and, encouraged by the prospect of assistance, they attacked and speedily expelled the invaders. "The castle of Home was retaken; the governor of Haddington, Sir James Wilford, made prisoner, and the party he commanded entirely defeated; the German garrison, which had been left in Coldingham, were cut to pieces; the enemy expelled from their fortifications in Incheith; the important strength of Fastcastle recovered by stratagem, and the English at length compelled to abandon Haddington, the defence of which had cost them so much blood and treasure."† The exploit by which the castle of Home was taken was characteristically daring. A few soldiers, who were on the watch for an opportunity of surprising it, perceiving on a certain night that the guards had relaxed their vigilance, boldly scaled the precipitous rock on which the castle was built, and, killing the sentinel, took possession of the fortress without difficulty. Fastcastle was recovered in a manner equally adventurous. The governor having ordered a supply of provisions, they were brought in waggons, in which, at the same time, a number of armed men were concealed; and these having suddenly emerged when the garrison were unprepared, obtained possession of the approaches, and with the assistance of their companions, who were waiting their signal in the neighbourhood, the enemy were easily overpowered, and the place secured.

In the meantime, considerable reinforcements were received from France. On the 23rd of June, De Thermes landed with one thousand foot and three thousand horse. This reasonable supply enabled the Regent to adopt more vigorous and decided measures. Everywhere the English were encountered with success. They were driven from point to point, and disputing every position, were yet compelled to relinquish them one by one. Broughty Castle, the strongest remaining fortress in Scotland, was wrested from them. Operations were next commenced against Lauder, which would also have been speedily captured, but at this juncture hostilities were arrested by the unexpected intelligence that peace had been concluded at Boulogne between France and England, and that Scotland had been made a party to the pacification. Henry had taken care to secure favourable terms for his allies. It was stipulated that the English should immediately evacuate the country, surrender Lauder, demolish the forts at Dunglas, Roxburgh, and Eyemouth, and refrain from any future invasion of Scotland, unless provoked by new injuries.* These conditions were gladly acceded to on the part of Scotland, and the Master of Erskine was dispatched to France to signify the assent of the Regent. Hostilities having thus happily terminated, peace was proclaimed at Edinburgh on the 20th of April, 1550.

It was impossible that the conclusion of a war of nine years' duration should not be hailed throughout Scotland with universal satisfaction. Immense misery and bloodshed had resulted from its protracted continuance, and no ultimate advantage had been gained by either party. Power and reputation had been lost by England; freedom and independence bartered by Scotland. Miserably had the Protector failed to carry out his project for the union of the two countries, through the marriage of the young queen. The precipitate measures adopted, the violence which marked their execution, and the excesses committed by his arms, effectually defeated his object, and rendered it positively obnoxious to a people who refused to have forced upon them the acceptance of any scheme, however apparently framed and proposed for their own advantage. Another evil, in connection with this war, was the introduction into Scotland of French troops. The summoning to their assistance of foreign mercenaries is a step which should always be avoided in the policy of a nation. Evil, and often fatal consequences must be involved in the adoption of such a measure. The spirit of independence, which should always be assiduously nurtured, is thereby subdued and weakened. Opportunities are afforded for encroachments on the liberties of the kingdom, and the prince who has been invited to defend, may aspire to rule. This was unfortunately destined to be the experience of Scotland. The presence of a French army necessitated the presence of French advisers, and the ascendancy of French counsels. It was every way important to the French monarch that his influence should be paramount in Scotland, and no exertions were wanting on his part for the accomplishment of his object. In after times he succeeded beyond expectation, and the ascendancy thus obtained ultimately produced disastrous consequences to the peace and wellbeing of the country. During the continuance of the war, the nation had ample reason to lament their precipitate resolution in requesting aid from Henry II. The French troops were haughty in their bearing and unruly in their conduct, so much so that the people could hardly be induced to act with them, or at times restrained from taking arms against them, and insisting on their immediate return to their own country. The mutual animosity which existed is well illustrated by the following incident. An idle quarrel having taken place between a French soldier and a citizen of Edinburgh, the city instantly became the scene of tumult and bloodshed. Animated with equal rage, both parties flew to arms, and fought with as much intensity of hatred as if the French, instead of friendly allies, had been ruthless invaders. Several persons of distinction, and amongst the rest Hamilton of Stenhouse, the Provost, and his son, lost their lives in this deplorable disturbance.*

The conclusion of a peace with England could not fail to be regarded with profound satisfaction by the Queen-mother, as she now had ample opportunity for developing the ambitious projects which for some time had been occupying her mind. The House of Guise had ever been characterised by a bold and aspiring spirit, and Mary of Lorraine shared it in an equal degree with her distinguished relatives. Her abilities were good, her capacity for business great, and her character on the whole such as did not disqualify her for the assumption of supreme authority, and the discharge of its responsibilities. She had long entertained the idea of supplanting the Regent, and in her own person undertaking the conduct of public affairs. From time to time she had managed, by a dexterous application of her talents, to insinuate her influence into the counsels of the nation; and, without appearing to take more upon herself than her position warranted, had in many instances virtually administered the government. But the possession of a power so extremely precarious, resting as it did on the weakness of Arran, or the forbearance of the nobles, was neither adapted to her talents nor congenial to her disposition. She was one of those whose pride would stoop to occupy a secondary place, only with the view of employing it as a platform from which to rise to a loftier elevation, and a more commanding sway. Her plans for this purpose were laid with great sagacity, and carried out with unwearied perseverance and consummate skill. In these schemes she was willingly assisted by her brothers, the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine, who supported her with all their influence at the court of France. To arrive at the proposed elevation she could proceed in one of two ways. She might either openly assert her claims to the Regency, and violently wrest it from the hands of its present possessor, or she might succeed in persuading him to abdicate his authority in her own favour. The first was a scheme which she at once perceived to be wholly impracticable. The support of the nobility would certainly be extended to Arran in such a contest. Her present position exposed her, as a foreigner, to be regarded with distrust. The slightest intimation of an intention to engage in her service the French mercenaries would be sufficient to ruin her for ever, and to excite in the country a feeling of exasperation which would never be allayed. Nor, on the other hand, did it seem a less hazardous experiment to attempt to persuade a man voluntarily to abandon an office involving such dignity and power, and from the highest station in the realm to descend to a level with those over whom he had once ruled with an almost regal authority. To the attainment, however, of this apparently impracticable object the queen now devoted herself, and throughout all her intrigues exhibited great prudence, sagacity, and determination. As nothing could be ultimately accomplished without an understanding with the French monarch and securing his co-operation, she determined to effect this without delay. For this purpose, The visit of the Queen-dowager to France. on pretence of a visit to her daughter, she resolved to repair in person to the court of France.

Early in September, six galleys and other French ships, under the command of Strozzii, Prior of Capua, anchored at Newhaven, where the Queen-mother embarked for her destination. A numerous and distinguished company of the nobles of Scotland had been invited to attend her. Her retinue included not only her own personal adherents, but also many who were regarded by her with uneasiness and alarm, and whom she preferred to take with her, trusting that she might find means of overcoming their dislike, and at all events assured that in her absence they could not prejudice her cause. She was accompanied by the Earls of Huntly, Cassillis, Sutherland, and Marischal, the Prior of St. Andrew's, the Lords Home, Fleming, and Maxwell, the Bishops of Caithness and Galloway, the French commanders Biron, La Chapelle, De Thermes, D'Ossell, and a brilliant train of ladies.* The voyage to the coast of Normandy was long and boisterous, having occupied no less than twelve days. Several times, through the severity of the weather, the fleet was compelled to take refuge in English ports, where—a safe-conduct having been granted to the Queen—they were kindly received and hospitably entertained. It is generally said that she finally landed at Dieppe on the 19th of September, 1550. From the following letter, however, written by the Constable Montmorency to the French Minister at the court of Hungary, it appears that this is a mistake. "The Queen of Scotland arrived three or four days ago at Havre-de-Grace, in good health and in very good company. She made her entry into Rouen yesterday. On Sunday next she comes to meet the king at the Abbey de Bonnes Nouvelles, where she goes to-morrow to sleep and keep the festival of St. Michael." According to the account of Sir John Mason, in his letter to the English Privy Council, "she was received with much honour by the King of France, and almost worshipped as a goddess by the court." From Rouen she proceeded to Paris, and from thence to Chartres and Blois, where she passed the winter. While resident in this city, she entered into frequent and earnest consultations with her brothers, the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of Lorraine, respecting the best mode of furthering her ambitious designs upon the Regency. In this undertaking she was warmly encouraged by her relatives, who promised to promote it with all their power, and to influence Henry and his court in her favour. Nor in this were they unsuccessful. They represented to that monarch that it was necessary to undermine the authority of the Regent, in order to maintain the French influence in Scotland, and to secure from destruction the ancient national religion. They pointed out the progress of the Reformation, and the danger of its becoming established in the land, and showed that the ascendancy of French councils was the only security they possessed against so terrible a catastrophe. Nor was this all. It was declared that Ireland was prepared to revolt against its present rulers, and 'needed but a token from France to be wholly at her devotion.* The idea of detaching Ireland from the English crown had originated with the Queen-mother, as a measure of policy during the invasion of the Protector; and, if she had succeeded in creating a rebellion in that country, she would most effectually have diverted from Scotland the attention of the English. It does not appear that her efforts were altogether vain; for, shortly after her arrival in France, there appeared at court the Archbishop of Armagh, an envoy of the Papal Government, who had been dispatched into Ireland for the purpose of encouraging a revolt, and who now reported that everything was ripe for an insurrection.†

These considerations had their proper weight, and Henry willingly consented to the schemes of the Queen-mother. It was now determined formally to propose to the Regent the resignation of his office. Panter, Bishop of Ross, the Scottish ambassador at the court of France, Sir Robert Carnegie, and Hamilton, Abbot of Kilwinning, were dispatched to Scotland on this mission. In making their proposals to Arran they alternately bribed and threatened. They promised him, on the one hand, in name of the French monarch, the dukedom of Chatelherault for himself, and for his son an establishment at court. A considerable pension was also offered to be guaranteed him, together with a public ratification of his conduct during the regency, and a parliamentary acknowledgment of his right of succession to the Scottish crown. On the other hand, in case he should refuse to comply, they pointed out to him that he would inevitably incur the displeasure of the French king; that he would be exposed to many dangers from the power and popularity of the Queen-dowager, and the growing alienation of the nobles; that he would be called to a severe reckoning at the majority of the sovereign; while, from the dilapidation of the revenue and the crown lands which had taken place during his government, and his general mal-administration, it would be utterly impossible for him to obtain an honourable discharge.* It is in the highest degree improbable that a proposal so extraordinary and unexpected would have been even for a moment acquiesced in by the Regent, had it not been for a circumstance which peculiarly favoured the views of the Queen-mother. This was the dangerous and well-nigh fatal distemper with which, at this time, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's was afflicted. This prelate was distinguished for his almost unbounded influence over the weak-minded and fickle Arran. Separated from the counsels which would certainly have guided him to a wiser and more politic conclusion, the Governor allowed himself to be won over by the golden promises of Arran's consort, Henry, and consented to an arrangement which his better judgment ought to have at once repudiated.† For their services in this matter, Panter was rewarded with the rich abbey of Lassaye, and the Prior of St. Andrew's with the priory of Masçon. The great object of the queen's residence in France being thus happily accomplished she returned to Scotland, in full expectation of being immediately invested with the government. In the meantime two parliaments assembled at Edinburgh, in the spring and winter of the year 1551, when some laudable attempts were made to introduce measures calculated to improve and regulate the economy of social life. Enactments were passed in prohibition of adultery, bigamy, blasphemous swearing, and indecent behaviour during public worship. And the press, which it is said teemed with indecent rhymes and ballads, with scandalous songs and tragedies, was subjected to the censorship of an ordinary, and restricted by a law, which compelled every printer to obtain a license from the queen and the governor.‡ Much exertion was used, and successfully, to repress disorder, to compose differences, to inspire respect for the law and the decisions of the justice courts, to stimulate industry, to humour the clergy, and either to conciliate or overawe the nobility.

While the country continued in the enjoyment of comparative tranquillity, and the queen had considerably advanced herself in the good opinions of the nation, she took advantage of the popularity she had gained, and claimed from Arran the fulfilment of his inconsiderate promise. But the

Arran retracts his promise. Regent had no intention of giving effect to his pledge. His friend and adviser, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, had recovered from his malady, which the Scottish physicians had pronounced incurable. His recovery was owing to the skill of the famous Cardan, a reputed magician.* His ascendancy over the Regent was the natural result of his restored health. Through his instrumentality it was that Arran retracted his promise, and declared his resolution to administer public affairs on his own responsibility. Though naturally indignant at such conduct, the queen dissembled her resentment, and concerted measures which should baffle the intrigues of her opponents, and bring about the event which she so ardently desired. All parties, without distinction, were assiduously courted by her. She distributed whatever favours were in her power, and when these failed she indulged in magnificent promises. In particular she endeavoured to gain over the Protestants, who had now organized a strong party, and possessed considerable influence in parliament and in the country. So tolerant were her opinions, so generous her sentiments, so large and liberal her professions, that she succeeded in detaching them from the Regent, and including them in the number of her most devoted adherents. To their exertions must be traced the ultimate resignation of the Governor, and the queen's appointment to the regency. It was evident that this consummation could not longer be delayed. 'Nearly a year had been spent in mutual crimination and intrigue.' The Regent had become contemptible in the eyes of his own subjects; his court was deserted by all men of rank or influence on all sides, with the exception of the primate. Intimation was made by the queen that parliament would be summoned, and an account exacted of his mode of administering the royal revenue. Thus pressed, Arran at length gave way; and at a meeting of the three Estates, which was held at Edinburgh, on the 12th of April, 1554, he solemnly abdicated the regency in favour of the Queen-mother. Instruments were produced, which formally approved of his conduct during the late administration; he was appointed governor of Dunbarton Castle, was invested with the Duchy of Chatelherault, and declared second person in the kingdom, and nearest in succession to the crown. A commission from the Queen of Scotland was then read, which conferred upon her mother the supreme authority; and the new Regent having intimated her acceptance of the office, immediately received the homage of the assembled parliament.* Thus did Mary of Lorraine, by her prudence, sagacity, and perseverance, attain to that dignity which for so long a period had been the object of her ambition.

* "I will be bold," says Randolph, in a letter to Cecil, "to trouble your honour a little with a merry tale. Carlotta, the Italian, took upon him the cure of the Bishop of St. Andrew's, in a disease that to all other men was judged desperate and incurable. He practised upon him divers foreign inventions; he hung him certain hours in the day by the heels, to cause him to avoid at the mouth that the other ways nature could not expel; he fed him many days with young whelps; he used him sometimes with extreme heats, and so many days with extreme colds. It is said that at that time he did put a devil within him, for that since that he hath been ever the better, and that this devil was given him on credit but for nine years; so that now the time is near expired, that either he must go to hell with his devil, or fall again into his old mischief, to poison the whole country with his false practices."—Tytler, vol. vi. Proofs and Illustrations, No. VIII.

The regency of Mary of Guise, hailed at the time with enthusiasm, was productive of consequences disastrous to the peace of the country as well as to the interests of the house of Stuart. By no means destitute of the qualities necessary Character of the to the discharge of the duties of her Regent. high position, she might have enjoyed a tranquil and prosperous reign, had she not from the first been involved in unfortunate circumstances and surrounded by bad advisers. In developing and maturing her ambitious schemes she had manifested great abilities, an accurate discrimination of character, and wonderful address in conciliating her opponents, in retaining the confidence of her adherents, and securing the affection and respect of all classes. Opposed from principle and prejudice to the Protestant party, she yet contrived by her prudent management to secure from them the support of her pretensions and the advocacy of her cause. To them, indeed, the ultimate success of her projects was principally owing.

The difficulties of her position were from the outset great. Her elevation to the Difficulties of regency was very much owing to her position. the assistance she had received from the court of France. The residence of her daughter, the youthful queen, at this court, had placed her in intimate and peculiar relations with Henry II. It was impossible that the obligations incurred by the Queen-mother should be lightly regarded or altogether ignored, nor were the Frenchmen likely to forget the part they had played or the services they had rendered. Thus, in the very commencement of her reign, the Regent was placed in circumstances which necessitated her giving offence to one or other of the powerful parties by which she was surrounded. She could not, on the one hand, endanger her alliance with France, by refusing to forward the interests of those whose claims were imperatively pressed on her attention; nor, on the other hand, could these claims be met without creating dissatisfaction among her subjects, and alienating the affections of her truest friends. Regardless of the consequences, Disposal of state however, which at first were not offices to the apparent, she proceeded to distribute the chief offices of state among the French noblemen and gentlemen who frequented her court. At this time the office of Lord Chancellor was filled by the Earl of Huntly, a man of great abilities and occupying a prominent position, being at the head of the Roman Catholic party in Scotland. This nobleman was virtually dispossessed of his power, retaining it only in name, his place being filled by Monsieur de Rubay, who was intrusted with the great seal and dignified with the name of Vice-Chancellor.

The office of Comptroller, one of great importance and responsibility, involving as it did the management of the public revenue, was committed to Monsieur Villemore. D'Oscell, though without any formal position in the conduct of public affairs, was admitted into the confidence of the Regent, and constituted one of her most influential advisers. These appointments were naturally galling to the Scottish nobility; and insulting as they were to the national pride, they created universal indignation. They were the first subjects of dissension between the Regent and her people, and her popularity sustained a shock which it never afterwards recovered. There were other circumstances which materially increased the difficulties of the Queen-mother's position. Two rival parties in the state, equally matched, if not in numbers, at least in strength, with mutual jealousies and animosities, contended for the mastery over each other, and for influence over the Regent. These were the Protestants and Romanists. To the former, as adherents of the ancient faith, she was closely united by her principles and her sympathies.

To the latter she was equally bound by the ties of gratitude, as without them she could not have attained to the proud eminence which had crowned and satisfied her ambition. Her wisest policy therefore was one of conciliation and forbearance, not exhibiting undue preference for either, but distributing her favours without partiality to both. It was out of her power, unfortunately, to preserve this balance of mind, or to refrain from furthering the aggrandizement of one party at the expense of the other. She wanted principles determinate in character; she was without singleness of aim and purpose; she was surrounded by selfish and unscrupulous advisers; she was besieged by needy and importunate suitors. Both parties could not be pleased. 'She could not grant enough to satisfy the Reformers, and she offended the Roman Catholics by granting their opponents anything.' The result, as might have been anticipated, was that both were dissatisfied and alienated.

One of the first acts of the new government was Disturbances in to dispatch the Earl of Huntly the North. with a commission of lieutenantcy to apprehend a notorious freebooter, John Murderac, the Laird of Moydart, a chief of the clan Ranald. The lawless character and predatory habits of the northern clans had frequently rendered necessary the adoption of severe measures for their punishment and suppression. James IV. had a crafty mode of dealing with these turbulent septs, which, as a general policy, was eminently successful.

To divert their attention and provide them with sufficient occupation in their own territories, he fomented their mutual jealousies and encouraged the natural antagonism of clan to clan, in order that, engaged with their own personal conflicts, they might neither have leisure nor inclination to combine for hostile movements against his own government. Frequently, however, and in spite of every precaution, one or other of the numerous septs started into open rebellion; and, on such occasions, a powerful nobleman, at the head of his retainers, set out for the seat of the disturbance, and aided by those who were only too glad to make common cause with him, for the purpose of avenging some old injury or fancied slight of their ancient rivals, crushed the insurrection.

During the regency of Arran, John of Moydart had openly defied the government, and refused, in answer to a summons, to appear before the court, which was then sitting at Inverness. Argyle, it appears, had undertaken to compel his attendance, and in case of his non-compliance to ravage his territories with fire and sword. This enterprise having never been conducted to a successful issue, if it was entered upon at all, and the year 1554 being distinguished by a fresh outbreak on the part of the clan Ranald, Huntly was commissioned with full powers to bring the offenders to justice. This expedition failed; some asserting that Huntly had acted treacherously, others suspecting the fidelity of the clan Chattan, who had ruined the undertaking, they said, on account of their inveterate animosity to their leader. This animosity had its origin in the following circumstances. When the Queen-mother was about to depart for France, Mackintosh, the chief of the clan Chattan, 'a young man liberally educated by the Earl of Moray,' had fallen into the hands of Huntly, who, without having charged him with any crime, except that which to him was the greatest of all offences, his refusal, arising from a love of independence, to acknowledge Huntly's superiority, had nevertheless confined him a strict prisoner, and contrived in his own absence, and by means of the instrumentality of his wife, to procure his execution.*

Whatever were the true reasons which led to the failure of Huntly's expedition to the Highlands, its unsuccessful issue was attributed to his own misconduct, and advantage taken of the circumstance by his numerous adversaries to compass his destruction. Returning in disgrace, he was immediately apprehended and committed to prison. Many circumstances might have operated in his favour with the Queen-mother. His services in her behalf, during the events which accelerated her ascendancy in the government, had been numerous and eminent. They were not sufficient, however, on the present occasion to protect him from the consequences of his real or supposed delinquency. The fact of his punishment being already decided upon, the only question which occupied the council of the Regent was its degree and extent. Some contended that his conduct had amounted to treason, and demanded his death; others proposed his banishment to France. Both counsels were objected to by his principal enemy, Gilbert Earl of Cassillis. It was finally resolved to deprive him of all his offices and to banish him to France for five years. The latter part of his sentence was afterwards commuted for the payment of a heavy fine.

On the assembling of parliament at Edinburgh (June, 1555) many wise and salutary measures of legal reform were proposed and adopted. Subsequently to this the Queen-regent travelled in royal state into the southern counties to hold justiciary courts, and from the following account of her proceedings by an English nobleman she appears to have discovered ability and discretion in the exercise of her judicial powers. "So far as I can learn, the Scotch queen doth greatly desire that justice be ministered on the Borders; and for the mere appearance thereof, since her repair to Jedworth, I do well understand that she hath called before her divers of the worst and greatest faulters both of Teviotdale and the March, and doth punish them in ward."* The principal adviser of the Regent

Henry Sinclair in the framing of measures for the simplifying of legal processes and the abridgement of the vexatious delays which but too frequently occurred in the settlement of suits was the "learned Henry Sinclair, Dean of Glasgow, Vice-President of the College of Justice, who had been a favourite counsellor of her late husband, James V.; but finding himself neglected by the Governor Arran, had retired to France." His legal knowledge was profound, and he enjoyed an almost equal reputation as a scholar and a statesman. In the judicious exercise of the powers intrusted to him many abuses were corrected, many corruptions were swept away, and justice, it is generally acknowledged, was then more impartially administered than at almost any former period in the history of the country.

The same spirit of reform in another direction was manifested by certain statutes of the parliament of 1555, "proscribing Robin Hood, Little John, the Queen of May, and the Abbot of Unreason, and prohibiting those ancient games and festivals in which women 'singing about summer trees' disturbed the queen and her lieges in their progress through the country." †

An event now occurred which threatened seriously to impair the Regent's popularity and to create an irreparable breach between her and her subjects. This was the attempted introduction into Scotland of a standing army, and that army to be composed of foreign mercenaries. Such a proposition could not fail to be equally offensive to the nobility and the nation at large. To the former it was especially obnoxious. For as an introduction to the measure, and in part Restraints to be also to furnish a pretence for its imposed on the adoption, it was contemplated to break down the power of the barons by enforcing a reduction in the number of their respective retainers, and prohibiting their appearance in public with a train of followers more numerous than their personal attendants. Under the feudal system it was not an uncommon thing for a Douglas or a Huntly to muster an assemblage of dependents sufficient to overawe the sovereign, and to impose upon him such terms as they thought proper. Acting in accordance with the counsels of her French advisers, the queen endeavoured, but without success, to introduce the sagacious policy of Henry VII., and to restrict within proper limits the almost regal domination of the Scottish barons. Proclamations were issued forbidding the attendance of a nobleman at the meetings of parliament, or the public conventions, with any other followers than his domestic servants.

As an answer to these proclamations, and by way of bravado, the Earl of Angus Bold conduct immediately rode to Edinburgh at of Angus. the head of a thousand horsemen. Appearing in the presence of the Regent, and upbraided by her for this daring violation of her express injunctions, the baron made this reply: "Well, madam, the knaves will follow me. Gladly would I get rid of them, for they devour all my beef and my bread; and much, madam, would I be beholden to you if you could tell me how to get quit of them." On this occasion she unfolded to the earl her scheme for the introduction of foreign troops, which, by forming a standing force, would effectually protect the realm from English invasion. With the old and sturdy spirit of a Scottish noble, Angus replied, shortly, "We will fight ourselves, and that better than any hired fellows."*

Notwithstanding this characteristic answer, the Regent persevered in attempting to carry out her measure. For the support of the foreign troops which should constitute a standing army, she proposed that a tax should be levied on landed property, and that for this purpose a general survey of the country should be undertaken, and the assessments adjusted according to the annual value of the estates which each baron possessed. The ob-

* Hume's History of the Douglasses. At another interview which took place on occasion of a court banquet, the queen proposed to Angus to place one of her garrisons of hired troops in his castle of Tantallan. For some time Angus made no direct reply, but addressing apparently a goshawk which he had brought in on his wrist, and which he was then feeding, he remarked, "The devil take the greedy gled! (kite) thou hast too much already, yet thou desirest more?" The Regent having again introduced the subject, he at length answered, "Oh yes, madam—why not, madam?—all is yours—ye shall have it. But, madam, I must be captain of your muster, and keeper of Tantallan."

noxiousness of this tax was speedily manifested in the spirit of determined opposition which it called forth. Noblemen and gentlemen, the barons to the number of three hundred, standing army. assembled in the Abbey Church of Holyrood, and, after denouncing the measure in strong terms, deputed Sir James Sandilands of Calder, and the Laird of Wemyss, to wait upon the queen, and remonstrate with her against the unconstitutional step she was then meditating. They remarked that Scotland had never wanted brave defenders in the person of their own sons; that they, like their ancestors before them, were prepared to fight her battles; that the admission of mercenaries into the country was hazardous and uncalled for; that the proposed registration of their lands, and inquisition into their fortunes, were unjustifiable innovations on their ancient customs, and would hardly be submitted to by the nation. This spirited remonstrance had the desired effect, and the measure was at once abandoned.

Peace had for some time been continued with England. The commencement of the war, however, between Henry of France and Philip of Spain, threatened to involve the nation in hostilities. The former had the Pope as an ally; the latter, in consequence of his marriage with Mary of England, was strengthened by considerable reinforcements from that country. Sensible of the great importance of securing the assistance of Scotland as a means of diverting the attention of his enemies, Henry dispatched ambassadors to induce the Regent to declare war against England. Naturally attached to the house of Guise, the queen was willing to give effect to the wishes of her kinsman. She assembled the nobles at Newbattle, recounted the numerous injuries which from time to time they had suffered at the hands of the English, and urged them at once to assume the offensive, and dispatch their forces to the Borders. Various motives have been assigned to account for the refusal of the barons on this occasion to carry out her plans. It is not improbable that jealousy of her French advisers, together with a natural unwillingness to engage in war merely to assist Henry, principally weighed with them in the decision they arrived at. It is certain their refusal was instant and peremptory. Foiled in her intentions, the queen compassed her end in another way. By the advice it is believed of D'Osell, she ordered, in violation of the late treaty, the fortress of Eyemouth, in the neighbourhood of Berwick, to be rebuilt. Here she planted a strong garrison, and established a magazine for military stores and artillery. This step, she was perfectly aware, would provoke the hostility of the English, for during the course of the last negotiations it had been mutually agreed that this fortress should be razed to the ground and never again reconstructed. The expectations of the Regent were at once realised. Eyemouth Castle was invested, and a pretence furnished for an immediate declaration of hostilities. In the meantime, aware of the disposition of the Regent, the Border chiefs had already made an incursion into the English territory; but, after some successful forays, a body of these marauders, under Lord Home, were encountered and signally defeated at Blackbrey. War being now determined on, proclamations were issued sunmouing the army to assemble at Edinburgh. From this city the Regent proceeded to Kelso, and there, in council, proposed that England should be instantly invaded. This was a step which the nobles at once decidedly refused to take. Disappointed and indignant, the queen attempted to compel them to the adoption of her measures by continuing the war in her own person, and by besieging, with the French force at her command, the castle of Wark. Troops and cannon were dispatched across the Tweed by the orders of D'Osell. The council, who had not been consulted in the matter, were enraged at this assumption of authority on the part of a foreigner; and, at the instance of the Duke of Chatelherault, an assembly of the nobles was convened at Maxwell Haugh, when a resolution was passed, which ordered the siege of Wark to be raised, and the troops to return to their own country. Her plans being thus everywhere thwarted, the Regent with reluctance disbanded her army.

We now come to one of the most interesting events in the history of the present times, the marriage between the youthful queen and the Dauphin of France. Many reasons weighed with the queen-mother in desiring the consummation of this alliance. The centre of contending factions, she had to play a difficult and arduous part. Ambitious of power, and desirous, if possible, of perpetuating her government, she perceived that in order to gain this end rigorous restraints must be imposed on the growing domination of such noblemen as Huntly, Argyle, and Chatelherault. Nothing could be better fitted to further her projects in this respect, as well as to confer additional strength on her own party, than an intimate union with France through the contemplated marriage of her daughter. But, however popular this alliance might be in the latter country, there were not wanting at court advisers of the monarch who strongly dissuaded him from giving it his sanction. Among these was the Constable Montmorency, who had exerted all his influence to break off an engagement which 'reflected so much lustre on the princes of Lorraine.' He had pointed out, that in the absence of the sovereign it would be difficult, if not impossible, to maintain order in the country; and that for this reason the young queen should be betrothed on one of the princes of the blood, who, by residing in Scotland, 'might preserve that kingdom an useful ally to France, which, by a nearer union to the crown, would become a mutinous and ungovernable province.'* The constable, however, was at this time a prisoner in Spain; and the influence of the house of Lorraine prevailed over these prudent counsels.

In the month of December, a parliament was summoned at Edinburgh to consider a letter which had just been received from the French monarch. After reciting at some length the ancient treaties and long continuance of friendship between the two nations, this letter expressed a desire that, as the Dauphin had attained the full legal age, the solemnization of his marriage with the Queen of Scots should no longer be delayed; and that for this purpose proper persons should be chosen out of the three Estates to proceed as ambassadors to the French court, and give to the important ceremony the sanction of their presence. This missive was favourably received by parliament; and, to give effect to the wishes of the king, eight noblemen and gentlemen were selected as commissioners from the Scottish nation, and authorised to complete the marriage. These were the Earl of Cassillis, Lords Fleming and Seton, the Earl of Rothes, James Beaton, archbishop of Glasgow, Robert Reid, president of the Court of Session, Lord James Stewart, prior of St. Andrew's, and John Erskine, provost of Montrose. The instructions they received were such as to do all honour to the parliament from which they emanated. Every precaution was adopted which could tend to secure the integrity and independence of the kingdom, and the maintenance of its laws and institutions. After a somewhat hazardous voyage, in which two of their vessels were wrecked, the ambassadors arrived at the French court, and at once entered on the peculiar duties of their mission. They found no difficulty in obtaining a full recognition of all their demands. To all appearance nothing could be more fair and honourable than the manner in which they were met by the French king. Preliminaries having been thus satisfactorily adjusted, both parties proceeded to arrange the conditions of the union. It was mutually agreed that the Dauphin, by consent of the king, his father, and his royal consort, should bear the name and title of King of Scotland; that the arms of that crown should be quartered with his own; and that on his accession to the throne of France, he should assume the title and arms of both kingdoms united under one crown. It was provided further, that the eldest son of the marriage should be king of France and Scotland; and that if daughters were the only issue, the eldest should be Queen of Scotland; that as a daughter of France, she should be portioned with a dowry of four hundred thousand crowns, and be disposed of in marriage with the united consent of the Estates of Scotland and the King of France. The jointure of Mary was fixed at six hundred thousand livres if her husband died after his accession to the throne; but if she became a widow when he was still Dauphin, it was to be reduced to half that sum. Lastly, the commissioners agreed, immediately after the marriage, to swear fealty to the Dauphin in the name of the Estates of Scotland, on the ground that their sovereign, the Dauphiness, was his consort.* These conditions having been formally arranged, the marriage of the illustrious personages was solemnized with great pomp at Paris by the Cardinal Bourbon, in the cathedral church of Notre Dame. The ceremony was attended by the King and Queen of France, four cardinals, the princes of the blood, and the most august personages of the realm.

But while everything on the part of the French had been conducted apparently with fairness and impartiality, in reality they had been guilty of baseness and treachery. Possessed of an insatiable ambition, the house of Guise attempted to compass by fraud what they could not obtain by force. Projects of a dishonourable character were entertained and carried out by some of the most distinguished members of the court of Henry II., amongst whom were the King himself, the Keeper of the Great Seals, the Duke of Guise, and the Cardinal of Lorraine. Ten days previous to the public transactions which ratified the conditions of marriage between the queen and Dauphin, Mary had been induced to subscribe three secret documents, containing stipulations highly dishonourable and perfidious. By the first, should she herself die without issue, she conferred the kingdom of Scotland, with whatever inheritance or succession might thereafter be connected with it, in free gift upon the King of France. The second provided that the same monarch should hold possession of the kingdom, till the sum of a million pieces of eight should be received by him, in discharge of the nation's obligations for expenses incurred by the education and maintenance of the queen in France. The last document embodied a declaration to the effect that these deeds were to be held valid, notwithstanding anything to the contrary she might afterwards be persuaded or necessitated to declare in consequence of the solicitation of her subjects, or the resolution of her parliament.† As a party in these secret and underhand transactions, Mary, from her youth and inexperience, being at this time only fifteen, must be held guiltless. The whole scheme was evidently concocted by the princes of the Guisian family, for the purpose of aggrandizing that ambitious house. Their designs on the liberties and independence of Scotland were speedily apparent. We have seen that the commissioners had agreed to swear fealty to the Dauphin, in virtue of his marriage with their sovereign. Their own interpretation of this act attached to it slight importance. His title, as king, they viewed as simply honorary and complimentary. But the French insisted on annexing to it solid privileges and supreme power. When the rejoicings consequent on the marriage ceremonial were concluded, the ambassadors were summoned to appear before the French council, and the chancellor demanded that the crown, or other insignia of royalty, should be produced, in order that the crown-matrimonial might be conferred on the Dauphin, and the rights of a legitimate sovereign vested in his person. To a demand so extraordinary it was at once replied that their mission was explicit; that they could not exceed their powers; and that even if it were not so, they would never be a party in any transaction which tended to change the order of succession to the Scottish crown. In this matter they had lately been furnished with a precedent for their conduct, which they were prudent enough to follow. The marriage articles between Mary of England and Philip of Spain had been framed on the principle of regarding with jealousy and suspicion the near approach of a foreigner to the throne. The commissioners from Scotland acted on the same principle, and their refusal to depart from it was firm and decided.*

Shortly afterwards the commissioners set out on their return to Scotland. It was a disastrous journey, for, on reaching Dieppe, four of their number died suddenly. Reid, the Bishop of Orkney, expired on the 6th of September.

After a few days, the Earls of Rothes and Cassillis, together with Lord Fleming, were also carried off, their illness lasting only a few hours. From their determined opposition to the ambitious schemes of the house of Guiso grave suspicions were entertained that these unexpected deaths were the results of poison, administered by some of their unscrupulous adherents. It is certain that their removal was very opportune for the French party, as their influence would have been employed against them when the questions at issue came to be decided by the Scottish Estates. The parliament assembled at Edinburgh in the beginning of December. Great efforts were made by the partisans of the house of Guise to obtain the consent of the three Estates to the conferring on the Dauphin of the crown-matrimonial. In this they were actively supported by the Queen-mother and the friends of the reformed religion. The movement was strenuously opposed by the Duke of Hamilton, whose interests would be seriously compromised by the proposed transaction. The contest was keen but unequal, for the party of the Regent, strengthened on this occasion by accessions from the Reformers, was all-powerful. Accordingly, an act was passed, declaring that the crown-matrimonial should be granted to the consort of Mary; that during his marriage his title should be King of Scotland; "that all letters should henceforth run in the style of 'Francis and Mary, King and Queen of Scotland, Dauphin and Dauphiness of Vienne;' and that the great seal of the kingdom and the current coin of the realm should be changed."† Every precaution was adopted to guard against any alteration in the order of succession being effected by this act. But, not content with the security thus afforded, the Duke of Hamilton entered his solemn protest against the concession which had now been made. Perhaps the most surprising circumstance in this transaction is the important assistance rendered to the Regent by the party of the Reformation. Certain it is that without this the would have signally failed in carrying out her measures. The only explanation which seems probable is, that the Protestants were desirous of conciliating the queen by timely compliances with her demands, when these were not incompatible with their ideas of absolute right and justice. Times of difficulty were at hand. Contests, the severity of which had been mitigated by intervening events, were about to be renewed; priestly tyranny was becoming every day more intolerable; and, with the prospect of coming into collision with the Romish party, a conciliatory policy was evidently the most prudent for the adherents of the reformed religion.

While these negotiations were being settled, the war between France and England was maintained on both sides with vigour and determination. In the progress of the campaign the arms of the Duke of Guise were attended with signal successes, and finally crowned by the capture of Calais. Scotland was but slightly involved in the contests of this period. The Borderers, indeed, of the respective countries were, as usual, actively engaged in forays; many incursions took place; many villages were burnt, and much booty secured. Two noblemen were taken prisoners by the English. An English fleet, under the conduct of Sir John Clare, was dispatched to harass the coasts of Scotland. Proceeding to the Orkneys, for the purpose of destroying Kirkwall, he landed a considerable force; but, before his operations could be carried out, his fleet was compelled, in consequence of a violent tempest, to put out to sea, and, without any further attempt, he returned to England.

At this time there happened an event the importance of which, in its bearings on the history of Europe, cannot be over estimated. This was the death of Mary, and the accession of Elizabeth to the throne of England. Distinguished in after years for the prudence, sagacity, and foresight of her counsels, this princess marked the commencement of her reign by an act of policy which proved her possession of the qualities now indicated. Motives were not wanting, urging her to carry on with vigour the war with France. Calais, which for two centuries had been in the possession of England, was now lost. The conduct of the house of Guise, in advancing the claims of Mary to the English throne, and setting aside the title of Elizabeth, whom they declared illegitimate, together with the assumption by Mary and her husband of the arms of England, were calculated to awaken her resentment and provoke her hostility.

Whatever were her feelings, she effectually dissembled them; and when treaties were concluded at the Chateau Cambresis between France and Spain, she consented to become a party in these negotiations. With this view she dispatched commissioners from England, who were instructed, however, that unless Scotland were included in the present treaty, it was needless to proceed further.* Treaty of Norham, The Queen-regent was not un-31st May, 1550. willing to conclude a peace, and Maitland of Lethington, her secretary, was sent to France to enter into such arrangements as might seem expedient. The result was that, independent of the treaties between England, France, and Spain, a separate treaty was concluded between Scotland and England.† The final negotiations on this subject were completed at Norham. It was provided by this treaty that the fortress of Eyemouth should be once more destroyed, that several castles lately erected on the English Borders should be also razed, and that a lasting peace should be proclaimed between the two countries.

In the meantime, the Reformation, which had Progress of the happily begun in Scotland, was Reformation. making rapid progress. Protestant opinions were almost universally diffused throughout the most populous parts of the country; and, whatever advances were made in religious enlightenment and zeal, were owing to the extraordinary exertions of the intrepid Knox. The Reformer, after the capture of the castle of St. Andrew's, having passed three years as a prisoner in France, regained his Career of John liberty (1550) at the intercession of Knox. Edward VI. Subsequent to this, having taken refuge at the English court, he was compelled to escape to the continent, in consequence of the accession of Mary. His residence at Geneva, and intimate association with Calvin, confirmed his attachment to the forms of Presbyterian worship, and induced a dislike of the more elaborate services of the Church of England. The year 1558 was memorable, as it witnessed the return of His return to the Reformer to Scotland, the subject of unalterable convictions and an invincible determination to do, as God enabled him, his great work, and at all hazards to complete the establishment of the Reformation. Everywhere his efforts in the cause of truth were crowned with remarkable success. His followers comprised many of the most eminent of the nobility: Erskine of Dun, Archibald Lord Lorn—afterwards Earl of Argyle—the Master of Mar, the Lord James Stewart—afterwards Regent—the Earl of Glencairn, the Earl Marischal, Sir James Sandilands, commonly known as Lord St. John, were amongst the number of his most distinguished adherents. It was impossible that such an example should be without its effect on the nation at large. Multitudes of all ranks surrounded his pulpit, attracted by the impassioned discourses of the great preacher. The Roman Catholic party, for a long time indifferent to the growing ascendancy of their opponents, were at length alarmed, and summoned Knox to answer for his conduct before an Ecclesiastical Convention. Arriving in Edinburgh for this purpose, no proceedings were instituted against him, but, on the contrary, he was permitted to preach without molestation. Tolerant as the Regent appeared on this occasion, she exhibited a different spirit when, having received a letter from the Reformer, by the hands of the Earl of Glencairn, exhorting her to renounce the errors of the Papacy, she handed it with an expression of contempt to the Archbishop of Glasgow, asking him whether he desired to read a pasquil—meaning, a pasquinade. At this period of his history, Knox received an Departure of Knox invitation from the congregation of for Geneva. Geneva to become their pastor. Induced probably by the dangerous position in which he was at this time placed he accepted of the invitation, and immediately set out for the continent. No sooner had he departed than he was again summoned to appear and stand his trial. In consequence of his failure to obey this summons he was summarily condemned, and burnt in effigy at the Cross of Edinburgh. Scotland, however, was not left without zealous and indefatigable preachers. Connected with a proclamation which was shortly issued to compel their attendance to answer Temper of the for their boldness, an incident hap- barons. pened which manifested the tone and temper of the barons who belonged to the Reformed Church. A numerous body having accompanied to the capital their respective ministers, and somewhat alarmed the Regent, she commanded all who had not been, specially summoned to repair to the Borders for fifteen days. Refusing compliance with this injunction, the significance of which was apparent, they forced their way into the presence of the Regent, and addressed her in the following strong terms: "We know, madam, that this is the device of the bishops who now stand beside you. We avow to God we shall make a day of it. They oppress us and our poor tenants to feed themselves. They trouble our ministers, and seek to undo them and us all. We will not suffer it any longer." This courageous address was delivered by Chalmers of Gathgirth, and, at its conclusion, the barons, who had hitherto remained uncovered, placed their steel caps upon their heads with a menacing air.*

Matters, which were evidently hastening to a crisis, were further precipitated by the drawing up, on the 3rd of December, 1557, by the lords of the congregation, of that memorable National covenant which at once put an end to all hesitation on the part of the Reformers as to their future proceedings, and formed the connecting link which banded them together into one united and powerful association. The signatures of many noblemen, including the Earls of Glencairn, Argyle, Morton, and Lord Lorn, were attached to this document. It embodied a declaration of their principles, and set forth in plain language their determination to secure for themselves and their adherents, the free and undisturbed exercise of the religion they professed. The formation of this Protestant league may be traced to the influence of Knox, who had dispatched from the continent a spirited address to the leaders of the movement, particularly Erskine of Dun, and Wishart of Pitarrow. Great consternation prevailed among the Roman Catholic party, in consequence of the adoption of these measures. Strong remonstrances were addressed to the Regent, but, from motives which can easily be understood, they were at this time unheeded. Policy demanded, on the part of the Queen-mother, the greatest forbearance in her treatment of the Reformers. She was then engaged in the project she had always so much at heart—the union of Mary with the Dauphin. The marriage had been proposed to parliament, but the sanction of that body had yet to be obtained. It was obvious that any indication of hostility towards the Protestants would have been fatal to her designs. Again, we have seen her anxiety that the crown matrimonial should be conferred on the Dauphin, and that this was accomplished through the assistance of the adherents of Knox. These considerations sufficiently account for the seeming indifference of the Regent to the complaints of her Romish subjects.

Notwithstanding the toleration exercised by the Queen-mother, the priesthood were still powerful enough to manifest their old spirit of tyranny and persecution. This was exhibited in their cruel

Martyrdom of treatment of Walter Mill, an old Mill, April, 1558. and enfeebled man, who, at the age of eighty-two, was condemned to the flames in the city of St. Andrew's. Universal indignation was awakened throughout the country by this murder. Measures were taken to instruct the nation as to the extreme oppression experienced at the hands of the ecclesiastical rulers. An address was also presented to the Regent, demanding the acknowledgment of their rights, and redress for their injuries. This address, which was full and explicit, strong in its statements, and imperative in its requirements, was presented by Sir James Sandilands, Preceptor of the Knights of St. John; and, although the Regent gave it no immediate answer, she promised to take it into her serious consideration. This temporizing policy produced different effects on the Protestants and Roman Catholics. The former were, in a measure, satisfied, and relying on the assurances of the Regent, abstained for the present from any public exercise of their religion. The latter were indignant at the timidity she discovered, and attempted to urge her to the adoption of more decided and severe measures. Terms of compromise were offered to the acceptance of both parties, but these were so unfavourable to the Protestants, that they were at once rejected. Parliament having assembled, on occasion of the return from France of the commissioners dispatched to arrange the marriage of Mary with the Dauphin, the lords of the congregation had prepared certain articles embodying their demands, with the view of presenting them for the consideration of the three Estates. Through the influence of the Regent, and by her earnest request, they desisted from their intention, and contented themselves with presenting to parliament a solemn protestation. This instrument was remarkable for the character of its statements, and the energetic language in which they were expressed; but this is not the place to give a detailed account of its contents.

From the remarks which have now been made, it will appear that, so long as any change of policy thing was to be gained from the in the Regent. exercise of forbearance towards the Protestants, that forbearance was uniformly extended. From no love of the reformed religion were its adherents treated with leniency and consideration. State reasons alone weighed with the Regent in the adoption and prosecution of this course of policy. But, no sooner did these motives cease to operate, than her conduct underwent a material change. She had employed the Reformers as the instruments of her ambition. Without their concurrence and assistance her greatest projects could not have been realized. All her schemes had been crowned with success. In Scotland she reigned supreme; in France the marriage of her daughter with the Dauphin was consummated, and the title of King of Scotland conferred upon the latter. It is not unusual for princes to despise the instruments by which they themselves have been elevated to power. It was reasonable to expect that the solicitations of the Roman Catholic party, to which she was attached by her principles, would not always be disregarded; and that the exercise of the powers they demanded would one day be granted them. But these, though legitimate explanations of the Regent's change of policy, do not comprehend or exhaust the whole facts of the case. There were other and more weighty considerations which actuated the queen in the conduct she subsequently pursued.

We have already alluded to the circumstance that claims were advanced on behalf of Mary to the throne of England. By the unprincipled conduct of Henry VIII., plausible pretences had been furnished for the setting forth to the world of these claims. The illegitimacy of both his daughters had been declared by Act of Parliament; but, notwithstanding of this, they were both called to the throne by the monarch himself, who was empowered to settle the order of succession. The validity of this settlement had never been formally recognised by the sovereigns of other nations. The right of Mary, however, to the throne had never been the subject of dispute. But the cases of Mary and Elizabeth were, in the estimation of Roman Catholics at least, totally distinct. The former was a member of the true church, and pledged to the upholding of the ancient faith. The latter was an acknowledged heretic, bent upon carrying out the meaasures of her father, and completing the establishment of the detested Reformation. Her accession to the crown was, therefore, throughout Europe, viewed by the subjects of the Pope with indignation and alarm. Advantage was taken of this circumstance by the ambitious princes of the house of

who would esteem the downfall of Protestantism as the happiest event for the world, they persuaded Mary and her husband, as already stated, to assume the title of King and Queen of England. This style and appellation were employed in public documents, some of which are still extant.* Their coin and plate were engraved with the arms of England, and everywhere throughout Europe their unfounded assumption was proclaimed. If the putting forth of these pretensions had been the only steps which they contemplated for the vindication of their claims upon the English throne, Elizabeth might well have afforded to despise such contemptible exhibitions. But the princes of Lorraine were resolved on the adoption of more serious measures. Their project pointed to the invasion of England; but how was this to be accomplished? "Elizabeth was already seated on the throne; she possessed all the intrepidity of spirit, and all the arts of policy which were necessary for maintaining her station. England was growing into reputation as a naval power. The marine of France had been utterly neglected; and Scotland remained the only avenue by which the territories of Elizabeth could be approached." It was on this side, therefore, that the Guisian princes determined that the attack should be made.†

To obtain the promise of assistance from the Regent, now became an object of the first importance. Messengers, accordingly, were dispatched to Scotland for this purpose, soon after the Peace of Cambrai. To the honour of this princess, she was wholly disinclined to embark in so wild an enterprise. Monsieur de Bettancourt, who had been specially deputed from the court of France on this mission, attempted, but in vain, to obtain her consent. To all his arguments she replied that the project would meet with no encouragement from Scotland; that the nation were unwilling to embroil themselves in a war with England; that, above all, their predilections in favour of the reformed religion would rather incline them to assist Elizabeth than to further the ambitious designs of their own sovereign. In the spirit of these remarks the Regent addressed serious remonstrances to the princes of Lorraine, and endeavoured to dissuade them from their enterprise. In this, however, she was signally unsuccessful; and, in an evil hour, reluctantly, and against her better judgment, she at last consented to the schemes, which ended, not as their inventors imagined, in the dethronement of Elizabeth, and the overthrow of the Reformation, but in their own discomfiture, the ruin of the French faction in Scotland, and the final triumph of the Protestant cause.

These negotiations, and their unfortunate issue, sufficiently explain the change of policy which was speedily manifested by the queen towards the Reformers. Committed by her own act to the adoption of measures which would involve the nation in a war with the English sovereign, her first step was directed to the breaking up of that powerful and united confederacy, of which the lords of the congregation were the acknowledged leaders. Unless this could be accomplished, and the Roman Catholics reinstated in their former position of influence and authority, it was hopeless to expect any earnest movement on the part of the Scottish people. Already was Elizabeth looked up to as the defender of the Reformed faith; and not till the sentiments of the country underwent a change in favour of the Papacy, could assistance be expected which should aid in her expulsion from the throne. Resolved, therefore, on the destruction of the Protestant party, she concluded that there was but one weapon with which her purpose could be effected, and that was persecution. The result, as might have been anticipated, was an immediate collision between the Protestants and Romanists. This more particularly occurred in a convention of the clergy, which was held at Edinburgh, in March, 1559, where the demands of the Reformers were not only refused, but steps taken which added considerably to their anger and exasperation. No language, it was declared, should henceforth be employed in the public services of the church except the Latin. An act was at the same time promulgated by the Regent, which condemned the principles of the Reformers, prescribed conformity in religion, and enjoined upon all the observance of daily mass; and summoning to her presence their chief leaders, she announced her intention of dealing with them in a different spirit from that she had hitherto discovered, and plainly intimated that their position was eminently perilous. Further, as a parliament was appointed to be held at Stirling, she issued proclamations enjoining the attendance of some of the most eminent of their ministers, to answer the accusations which had been lodged against them. This behaviour on the part of the queen naturally awakened indignation and alarm in the lords of the congregation. Resolved upon remonstrance, they dispatched the Earl of Glencairn and Sir Hugh Campbell, Sheriff of Ayr, to wait upon the Queen-mother. In calm and dignified language they represented their right to hold and profess such opinions in religious matters as they thought proper, and requested her to abstain from interfering with their preachers, so long as they could not be charged with disseminating principles dangerous to the state, or contrary to the word of God. at these remonstrances, the Regent exclaimed with bitterness and contempt, that she would silence their ministers, though they were as eloquent as St. Paul.* Reminded of the fair promises of toleration, so frequently made to the leaders of the congregation, she replied in words which cannot be sufficiently reprobated—that the promises of princes ought not to be urged upon them, unless they could conveniently observe them. The reply of the deputation was bold and spirited: "If, Madam," said they, "you are resolved to keep no faith with your subjects, we will renounce our allegiance; and it will be for your grace to consider the calamities which such a state of things must entail upon the country."† It is possible that the adoption of this decided tone might have induced the queen to reconsider her decision, had not an event now occurred which determined her to pursue the course on which she had entered. Intelligence was communicated

Perth embraces to her at this time that Perth the Reformed 'had publicly embraced the Reformed opinions.' In great consternation, she instantly sent for the provost of that city, and commanded him to enforce the laws, and put an end to the religious disturbances which distinguished his district. The provost, Lord Ruthven, replied that 'he could bring the bodies of his citizens to her grace, and compel them to prostrate themselves before her, till she was fully satiate of their blood; but over their consciences she had no power.'‡ For this 'malapert' reply, as she termed it, he was sharply reprov'd; and the Regent having again recourse to her former oppressive measures, repeated her citation to Paul Methven and others of the Reformers, to repair to Stirling, and appear before the parliament summoned to assemble in the month of May. In addition to this, she ordered the festival of Easter to be celebrated with all the accustomed pomp and ceremony peculiar to the Church of Rome.

Affairs were now approaching to a crisis, and both parties prepared for the collision which appeared inevitable. At this period, however, the return of Knox to his native country, in consequence of the urgent invitation addressed to him by the lords of the congregation in the preceding year, produced an important change in the state of parties. The Reformers were immensely strengthened and encouraged. Their opponents were proportionably dismayed. Their former experience of the presence of this bold and uncompromising man, afforded the Romanists little comfort in the prospect of the struggles that were now before them. The effects of his commanding influence and overpowering eloquence were not yet forgotten; and they trembled to confront him in circumstances calculated to call forth all his surpassing powers and invincible energy. His first act was to repair to Dundee, and enter into consultation with his friends on the measures to be adopted in this emergency. As the time approached for the appearance at Stirling of the ministers who had been served with citations, the lords of the congregation resolved to accompany them, and for this purpose some of the principal barons set out for Perth. From this place they deputed John Erskine of Dun, a man of great authority with their party, and distinguished for the prudence and moderation of his counsels, to wait upon the Regent at Stirling, and explain the object they had in view. Though their numbers were considerable, they were without arms, and had no hostile intentions; they were only desirous of affording, by their presence, countenance to their ministers, and aiding them in answering the unjust accusations which had been brought against them. Apparently, these representations were frankly accepted by the Regent, in the same spirit in which they were offered. In reality, however, this was not the case. But, concealing her duplicity of the real sentiments, she avowed her willingness to concede any reasonable demands; and that, if the people would disperse, she would grant them the free exercise of their religion, discharge the summonses against their preachers, and secure to them the unmolested discharge of their sacred functions. Trusting to the sincerity of the Regent, Erskine wrote letters to his friends, detailing the results of his mission, and advising that the conditions of the Queen should be at once complied with. Accordingly, the greater part of the people were dismissed from Perth, by orders of the barons, who, however, remained behind to observe the issue. The conduct of the Queen-mother was on this occasion extremely treacherous. No sooner were her wishes fulfilled, than her promises were conveniently forgotten. Her conduct evinced that she had formed engagements without the slightest intention of giving them effect. She gave no orders for the toleration of the Protestant faith; she discharged none of the summonses against the ministers, but commanded them, in every case, to be rigidly enforced. On the day appointed for the trial, no appearances being made on the part of the Reformers, they were at once condemned as contumacious; sentence of outlawry was pronounced against them; and the lieges were forbidden, under the penalty of high-treason, to harbour or support them. It has been attempted to defend the proceedings of the Regent, on the plea that the conditions agreed upon between herself and Erskine had not been fulfilled, because the barons and the ministers remained at Perth. The fallaciousness of this defence is apparent, from the circumstance that the agreement evidently pointed to the dispersion of the people, and apart from their followers, she had nothing to apprehend from the lords of the congregation.

We can readily imagine the resentment of the barons at such palpable duplicity. Erskine indignantly withdrew from court, and, rejoining his friends at Perth, warned them to be on their guard against the dangers which now threatened them. Knox, who was then at Perth, opportunely mounted the pulpit, and delivered one of his most powerful discourses against idolatry in general, and the adoration of the host in particular. The people were agitated, but his large congregation dispersed without tumult. There now occurred one of those strange incidents which, trivial in themselves, give birth to momentous consequences. At the conclusion of the services, when the church was comparatively empty, a priest uncovered one of the rich altar-pieces and prepared to celebrate mass. A young man, who witnessed the proceeding, exclaimed that this was intolerable. A blow from the priest was answered by a stone, which struck the altar and demolished one of the images. This was the signal for a general attack. In a short time the altar was destroyed, the shrines despoiled of their ornaments, the beautiful carved work broken to pieces, and the images and pictures shared the same fate. On the same day similar excesses were committed in other parts of the town, the houses of the Grey and Black Friars were plundered, and the Charter-house or Carthusian monastery, a building of great magnificence, was wholly demolished. Nor was the popular indignation satisfied with this manifestation. The same spirit of destructiveness exhibited itself in other places, particularly in the town of Cupar-Fife.

When these proceedings were related to the queen, she was transported with rage and grief, and her resentment was expressed in no measured terms. She denounced summary and dreadful vengeance against the Reformers. Lamenting the destruction of the beautiful Carthusian Church, and the desecration of the tombs of James I., his queen, Jane Beaufort, and of her own mother-in-law, the late Queen Margaret Tudor, she declared her resolution to 'raze the town of Perth to the ground and sow it with salt, as a monument of perpetual desolation.'* She instantly summoned to her assistance the Earls of Hamilton, Argyle, and Athol, with their friends and vassals, and sent orders to D'Osell to join her with the French troops under his command. At the head of the forces thus collected, she advanced to Perth, on the 18th of May, with the hope of surprising the confederates. Intelligence, however, of these preparations had reached the Protestants, who lost no time in preparing for their defence. Everywhere throughout the country the greatest exertions were made to dispatch assistance to their friends. Amongst others who were foremost with their aid was Alexander, Earl of Glencairn, who mustered two thousand five hundred horse and foot, and marching with all speed, succeeded in avoiding the Regent's camp, and reached Perth in safety. This welcome reinforcement not only secured the town against the dangers of an attack, but in a few days enabled the Reformers to take the field and to face the Queen, who advanced against them with a strong force.

* Knox; Tytler, vol. vi. p. 101.

Previous, however, to committing themselves to more decided measures, the lords of the congregation addressed three letters, one to the Regent, another to the nobility, and a third to the Roman Catholic prelates. In the first they professed their willingness to continue in obedience to the State on the single condition of being allowed to worship God according to their consciences. They declared their determination to lay a statement of their case before their Sovereign and the King of France, and willingly to abide by their decision.* The second letter addressed the nobles in stronger language, embodying a defence and justification of their conduct. "Our long and earnest request hath been," they remarked, "and still is, that in open assembly it may be disputed in presence of indifferent auditors, whether that these abominations, named by the pestilent Papists religion, which they by fire and sword defend, be the true religion of Jesus Christ or not. Now this our humble request being denied us, our lives are sought in a most cruel manner; and ye, the nobility, whose duty is to defend innocents and to bridle the fury and rage of wicked men, were it of princes or emperors, do, notwithstanding, follow their appetites, and arm yourselves against us, your brethren and natural countrymen."† The third letter had this remarkable superscription: "To the generation of Antichrist,

Letter to the Regent from the congregation.
Letter to the nobility.
Letter to the prelates.

the pestilent prelates and their shavelings, within Scotland." In this, as may be imagined, prelay was denounced in the strongest and most vehement language. This epistle has been severely animadverted on by modern historians. This is not the place to enter upon a formal vindication of its matter or its language. Thus much we may state, that these were not the times when men were wont to indulge in courtly and unmeaning phrases; that the statements made in regard to the cruelty and profligacy of the prelates did not exceed the truth; that the wrongs endured by the Reformers at the hands of their opponents were not exaggerated, and that the terms they employed in characterising these wrongs were justified and demanded by the unparalleled circumstances in which they were placed.

All attempts at negotiation having proved abortive, the Regent would probably have attacked the Protestants, had she not suddenly become aware of the great accession to their numbers derived from the troops brought by the Earl of Glencairn. These reinforcements inclined her to desire terms of accommodation; and conditions of peace were arranged, through the mediation of the Earl of Argyle and the Lord James, who, though they had subscribed the covenant, still adhered to the Regent, and refused to approve of the decided measures adopted by their party. It was agreed that both armies should be disbanded, and the gates of Perth set open to the Queen; that indemnity should be granted to the inhabitants of the city and to all in any way concerned with the late disturbances; that the town should not be occupied by a French garrison, and that no Frenchman should approach within three miles of it; that all religious controversies should be reserved till the meeting of Parliament; and that, in the meantime, the utmost toleration should be granted to the Reformers.* Matters being thus arranged, the Regent, with comparatively few attendants, entered the city, and met with an honourable reception. In her progress through the streets, an unhappy incident occurred, which inflamed the minds of the inhabitants, and tended to confirm the estrangement which already existed. Passing by the house of a respectable citizen, one Patrick Murray, six of the French mercenaries levelled their pieces and shot into a wooden balcony, whence his family were viewing the procession, thereby killing his only son, a youth thirteen years of age.† The remark of the Queen on this melancholy occasion, when the body was laid before the house where she was then resting, was at once heartless and impolitic. She said it was truly an unhappy event, the more so as it fell on the son rather than the father; but it was no fault of hers, neither was she accountable for accidents. Her conduct at Perth at once discovered that the treaty she had entered into was one of convenience only, and that, on the first opportunity, she would set it aside. Its articles, indeed, were never carried out. Several of the citizens were banished, others fined; the Provost and magistrates were removed from their office; and, on her departure for Stirling, a garrison of six hundred Scottish soldiers, in the pay of the King of France, was established in the city. Remonstrated with, on account of these unwarrantable infractions of the articles of peace, she replied that she was not bound to keep faith with heretics.

Fortunately for their cause, the lords of the congregation, before they separated, had solemnly entered into a new covenant, in which it was agreed mutually to defend each other and the body of which they were members, "sparing neither life, labour, nor substance, in maintaining the liberty of the brethren" against whomsoever should trouble them on account of their religion. This agreement was signed by the Earls of Argyle and Glencairn, the Lord James, Lord Boyd, Lord Ochiltree, and Mathew Campbell, of Tarmagannare. The intentions of the Queen being now manifestly of a hostile character, the Protestants discovered great activity in the reassembling of their forces. The court was immediately deserted by the Earl of Argyle and Lord James Stuart, who were soon after followed by the Earl of Monteith, Lord Ruthven, and Murray, of Tullibardine. Summoned by the Regent to return, on pain of her displeasure, they replied that her conduct had rendered this impossible; that, through the duplicity of her measures, they felt themselves no longer safe in her presence; and that they could not afford to countenance her in the oppression of which she and her council were guilty towards those whom, in respect of their common faith, they regarded as brethren.

Subsequent proceedings of the Queen-mother opened the eyes of the Reformers to the extent of her designs. They perceived that she aimed not only at the repression of the Reformation, but that her efforts were directed towards the subversion of the liberties of the kingdom, and its subjection to the power of the French faction. The French forces had retired from Scotland in the year 1550, but they had continued to return at different times and under various pretences. This new feature in the policy of the Regent considerably strengthened the hands of the Reformers, alienated many of her own party, and induced not a few to engage actively in the struggle who would otherwise have remained passive and indifferent. Letters were now dispatched by the confederate lords to the Provost of Dundee, the lairds of Dun, and Pitarrow, and others of their supporters, urgently entreating their assistance in the impending contest, and requesting them, as a first step, to assemble without fail at St. Andrew's. On the 4th of June they were joined by many of their most zealous adherents and by Knox, who had been preaching throughout the country with great success. His sermons at Crail, and the neighbouring seaport of Anstruther, were followed by manifestations of popular feeling, equally violent with that which had lately been exhibited at Perth. A similar outbreak took place at St. Andrew's, when the monasteries of the Dominican and Franciscan orders in that city were totally destroyed. St. Andrew's was the residence of the Metropolitan of Scotland, and the Archbishop, who was present when these excesses were committed, instantly repaired to the Regent, who lay with her French troops at Falkland. Amazed and indignant at these riots, she determined to march upon St. Andrew's without delay. Aware that the Reformers were without forces, she expected to surprise them, but in this hope she was destined to be disappointed. Intelligence of her movements was rapidly communicated, and no difficulty was experienced in raising a considerable army. Men of all ranks hastened to their assistance, and in such numbers that, to use the language of Knox, 'they seemed to rise from the clouds.'* It is said that Argyle and Lord James left St. Andrew's with only a hundred horse, but before they reached Falkland, about fourteen miles, their forces were so largely augmented, that the Regent hesitated to encounter them. In fact, when the congregation encamped on Cupar Moor, they found themselves considerably superior in numbers to their opponents, so that the Queen was necessitated to enter into negotiations,

After some delay, they consented to a truce of eight days. They demanded, as the conditions of its observance, that no Frenchman should remain in the kingdom of Fife, and that commissioners should be sent to St. Andrew's, with instructions to arrange a more lasting peace. It was clearly understood by the Protestants that the truce was a mere artifice to procure delay, and that the Queen had no intention of carrying the stipulations into effect. Her designs on the liberties of Scotland having been made apparent, she now found herself in a position of difficulty and danger. She had now to deal with men who had taken up arms not merely for the vindication of their religious rights, but with the full determination of asserting their independence as Scottish subjects, and defending the constitution of the realm against all assailants. They were prepared to protest against French influence and French domination; and no settlement of affairs would meet their wishes which had not the departure of the French out of the kingdom as its first and indispensable condition. But the Regent, had she been ever so inclined, could not have ventured to adopt so decided a step without the concurrence of the French monarch. Hence she was compelled to amuse the Reformers with fair words and promises which she had no intention to observe. Doubtless she expected to receive from France such reinforcements as should enable her to dictate her own terms. In the meantime, no commissioners were sent to St. Andrew's, and consequently no measures adopted for the maintenance of peace.

The Reformers were now joined by Sir William Kirkaldy, of Grange, 'a soldier of great military experience, and undaunted determination.' No steps having been taken by the Regent to recall from Perth the French garrison, and tidings being daily received of their cruelties and exactions, and also of the oppressive conduct of the new Provost, the unprincipled Charteris, the leaders of the con-

Reformers invest gregation resolved to advance on Perth. Perth, and to compel the French troops to abandon that town. Accordingly, they marched thither in great force, and on the 24th of June the garrison were summoned to surrender. On their refusal, the city was formally invested—batteries were opened upon it by Lord Ruthven on the west, and on the east quarter by the citizens of Dundee. These measures had the effect anticipated, and on the following day the town was surrendered to the Reformers, whose first step was to restore Ruthven to his office as Provost, from which he had been illegally expelled. The possession of this place was an object of importance to both parties, and, as might be expected, conferred considerable advantage on the Protestant cause. Alarmed at the loss of Perth, the Regent attempted to advance on Stirling, which was strongly fortified, and commanded the approaches to the only bridge over the Forth. Her intentions were defeated by the rapid marches of her opponents, whose appearance before the gates of the fortress was heartily welcomed, and their admission immediately allowed. Animated by these successes, their measures became bolder and more decided. Mustering a force which amounted to no more than three hundred men, they proceeded from Stirling in the direction of Linlithgow. This force was under the command of the Lord James and the Earl of Argyle. But such was the enthusiasm of the people, that great multitudes from all quarters flocked to their standard, and their army speedily numbered five thousand men. Having secured Linlithgow, they pressed forward to the capital. No opposition interfered with their progress. The Queen-regent precipitately abandoned her position, and retired, together with her French forces, to Dunbar. Edinburgh was taken of Edinburgh. possession of without resistance, on the 29th of June, 1559. The ultimate intentions of the Reformers were now unreservedly declared. Resolved, not to be content with the mere toleration of their religion, they aimed at the total subversion of popery, and the establishment on its ruins of that protestantism for which they had so cheerfully laboured and endured. With these views, they determined to fix their residence in the capital, for the purpose of disseminating their opinions, and, if possible, augmenting the number of their adherents. Accordingly, the pulpits of Edinburgh were occupied by Knox and other ministers, whose zeal, energy, and eloquence were eminently successful in advancing to a prosperous issue the glorious enterprise to which they were devoted.

That the views of the leaders of the Reformed movement were such as we have now characterised may be easily determined. There are documents in existence which afford us some valuable information on this point. In a letter addressed to Sir Henry Percy by Sir William Kirkaldy, of Grange, on the day subsequent to the occupation of Edinburgh, the object of the party is thus explicitly declared: "I received your letter this last of June. Perceiving thereby the doubt and suspicion you stand in for the coming forward of the congregation, whom I assure you, you need not to have in suspicion; for they mean nothing but reformation of religion, which shortly, throughout the realm, they will bring to pass; for the Queen and Monsieur D'Osell, with all the Frenchmen, for refuge are retired to Dunbar. The foresaid congregation came this last of June, by three of the clock, to Edinburgh, where they will take order for the maintenance of the true religion, and resisting of the King of France, if he sends any force against them. . . . The manner of their proceeding in Reformation is this: they pull down all manner of friaries, and some abbeys, which willingly receive not the Reformation. As to parish churches, they cleanse them of images, and all other monuments of idolatry, and command that no masses be said in them; in place thereof, the book set forth by godly King Edward is read in the same churches. They have never as yet meddled with:

a pennyworth of that which pertains to the church; but presently will take order, throughout all the parts where they dwell, that all the fruits of the abbeys, and other churches, shall be kept and bestowed upon the faithful ministers, until such time as a further order be taken. Some suppose the Queen, seeing no further remedy, will follow their desires, which is, a general reformation throughout the whole realm, conform to the pure word of God, and the Frenchmen to be sent away. If her Grace will do so, they will obey her and serve her, and annex the whole revenues of the abbeys to the crown. If her Grace will not be content with this, they are determined to hear of no agreement."*

Another letter, on the same subject, was about this time addressed to Percy by Knox himself. From its tenor it appears that grave suspicions were entertained in England, as to the ultimate objects which the Reformers had in view; and that on this account it was highly advisable to furnish credible information of their doings and designs, for the satisfaction of Elizabeth and the nation. "The troubles," says Knox, "of this realm you hear, but the cause to many is not known. Persuade yourself and assure others, that we mean neither sedition, neither yet rebellion against any just and lawful authority, but only the advancement of Christ's religion, and the liberty of this poor realm. If we can have the one with the other, it will fare better with England, which, if we lack, though we mourn and smart, England will not escape without worse trouble."†

Several points of considerable importance are brought out by these documents. They determine the views of the Protestants, which included civil and religious objects, the expulsion of the French, and the establishment of the Reformation. They evince the real moderation of the very men who apparently were chargeable with the wildest excesses; for while monasteries were destroyed, and images broken in pieces, they refrained from any distribution or appropriation of ecclesiastical property, and were willing to consent that a transfer of the whole should be made over to the crown, provided only that the ministers of the gospel had secured to them a sufficient maintenance. Further, we learn that in all their proceedings, they were not animated by mere selfish considerations, but were impelled onward by patriotic desires, which urged them to vindicate the independence of the kingdom, and to preserve in their integrity their ancient liberties. The event which they dreaded most was the arrival of French troops, and the exercise of an influence amongst themselves, which it was at once dangerous to admit and difficult to resist. Hitherto they had every reason to be satisfied with their progress. Their successes had been as great as probably they were expected. Their cause was popular, the nobility had generally declared in their favour, numbers of strength were daily received, and it seemed not unlikely that a very advantageous alliance might be formed with England; for, soon after the letter of Kirkaldy had been dispatched, he was invited to a private interview with Percy, which took place at Norham. This event had been brought about by the arrangements of Cecil, secretary to the English Queen. Percy had received instructions to communicate with the barons, and inform them of the disposition of England, to enter into a league with them, and afford them substantial assistance.

In the meantime, the Regent made great exertions to recover the position which she had lost. In daily expectation of receiving large reinforcements from France, she adopted measures calculated to dampen the cause of the Reformers, and to cool the ardour of many of their adherents. Reports were suddenly promulgated that their intentions pointed to the subversion of the existing government, that religious reforms were only a colourable pretence for bringing about important political changes, and that the crown itself was an object of ambition to the Lord James, one of their greatest leaders. These charges were made in a public and formal manner. Proclamations were issued in the name of Francis and Mary, King and Queen of Scotland, setting forth, 'that the Protestants were guilty of sedition; that they had seized the irons of the Mint, and maintained a treasonable correspondence with England.' They were enjoined to depart immediately from the capital, and were informed that if they had grievances to complain of, a parliament would be summoned to consider them, and that for the present they should enjoy full liberty of conscience in all matters of religion. The Protestants indignantly repudiated the intentions attributed to them; and, in a letter to the Queen, declared themselves obedient subjects, willing to conform to the existing Government, and professed that their only objects were the promotion of God's glory, the defence of their ministers, and the destruction of idolatry.*

In spite of their remonstrances, however, the measures of the Regent were successful in detaching from the party not a few of their principal adherents. Negotiations were now entered into by commissioners from both sides, who assembled at Preston, in Midlothian. These negotiations resulted in no arrangement, as the principal condition proposed by the Regent, that wherever her residence was fixed the Protestants should refrain from preaching, was evidently one which could not be accepted. While the conferences were still in progress, letters were dispatched to Elizabeth and her secretary, Cecil. In answer to an inquiry from the latter, as to whether they were determined on a change of government as well as of religion, they replied, "that as yet we have made no mention of any change of authority, neither yet hath any such thing entered into our hearts, except that extreme necessity compel us thereto. But perceiving that France, the Queen-regent here, together with her priests, and Frenchmen, pretend nothing else than the suppression of Christ's evangel, the maintenance of idolatry, the ruin of us, and the utter subversion of this poor realm, we are fully purposed to seek the best remedy to withstand their tyranny, in which matter we unfeignedly require your faithful counsel and furtherance at the Queen and council's hands, for our assistance." * The policy of Elizabeth's chief minister at this time appears to have been undecided and temporizing. His anxiety was to keep on good terms with both parties. On the one hand he was unwilling to offend the Regent by openly countenancing her opponents, approving of their measures, and granting them substantial aid. On the other hand, he was far from desiring the suppression of the Reformed party: it was impossible not to sympathize with the movement, but it seemed equally impossible for the present to devise means which should effectually further its advances. Peace had been lately concluded with France, and it was not apparent how England could, on this account, consistently interfere in the affairs of Scotland.

It is evident that whatever her intentions were, Elizabeth had no wish that the disturbances of the country should be brought to a termination; and, on her part, nothing was left unsaid which could encourage the Reformers to pursue the course on which they had entered. These conclusions are apparent from the letter sent by Cecil to the lords of the congregation, and addressed to the Earls of Glencairn and Argyle, the Prior of St. Andrew's, and Lords Boyd and Ochiltree. This communication exhorted them to prolong the contest, to purge the land from idolatry, and to despoil the prelates of their riches after the fashion of Henry VIII. "Ye know," he says, "your chief adversaries, the popish kirkmen, be noted wise in their generation: they be rich also, whereby they make many friends, by their wit with false persuasions, by their riches with corruption. As long as they feel no sharpness they be bold; but if they be once touched with fear they be the greatest cowards. In our first Reformation here, in King Henry the Eighth his time, although in some points there was oversight for the help of the ministry and the poor; yet if the prelaey had been left in their pomp and wealth, the victory had been their's. I like no spoil; but I allow to have good things put to good uses, as to the enriching of the crown, the help to the youth and the nobility, the maintenance of the ministry in the church, of learning in schools, and to relieve the poor members of Christ, being in body and limbs impotent."*

Meanwhile, a vigorous attempt was made by the Regent to recover the possession of Edinburgh. Advancing unexpectedly from Dunbar by a rapid night march, she appeared before the city with all her forces. The affairs of the congregation were in no flourishing condition, and it was hopeless to attempt to cope with the superior strength of their opponents. In these circumstances, negotiations were resumed, and on the twenty-fourth of July a truce was concluded, to last till the tenth of January. Conditions were mutually agreed to, by which it was stipulated, on the part of the Regent, that the Protestants should evacuate the capital, and promise to render dutiful obedience to the government, to abstain from all future violation of religious houses, and to offer no impediment to the collecting by the popish clergy of their tithes, stipends, or any other revenue; on the part of the Reformers, it was settled that no molestation should be given to the preachers or professors of their religion, that the citizens of Edinburgh should be allowed to choose their own form of worship, and that no garrison should be introduced into the town. Little anxiety was felt by the queen in regard to the observance of this truce, as she had now received promises of assistance from France, and was in daily expectation of its arrival. Measures had been taken by the French court to make itself acquainted with the state of mat-

Here he instituted inquiries into the truth of the reports which had been so industriously circulated to the disadvantage of the Reformers, and his investigations seem to have been conducted with impartiality and prudence. A modern historian, indeed, has attempted to charge him with incompetence and insincerity, and affirms "that the manner in which he executed his commission, argues either extreme simplicity, or a predetermination not to seek the truth."† We apprehend, however, that this is a thoroughly gratuitous statement, and it is unsupported by other than the most unsubstantial evidence. The desire of the French government was to ascertain the truth of the allegation, that the Lord James was engaged in treasonable designs, which had for their object the seizure of the crown. That this was the case, has never been alleged even by his enemies. But no difficulty could have been experienced in coming to a conclusion as to its truth or falsehood; and we have no reason to suspect that care was not exercised in arriving at a correct decision.

On the conclusion of the truce, the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earl of Huntly desired and obtained an interview with the lords of the congregation. This step was adopted in consequence of their suspicions as to the projects of the Regent, and the threatened subversion of the liberties and independence of the kingdom. These noblemen, at this time the most powerful of the adherents of the queen, had continued their attachment to her cause during the late commotions, but disliking the tendency of her councils, determined, at all hazards, to provide for the safety of the realm, and, with this view, entered into consultation with Argyle, the Prior of St. Andrew's, and the Earl of Glencairn. With these barons pledges were exchanged, that if the queen should, with her usual insincerity, "violate any condition in the articles of truce, or refuse to gratify the wishes of the whole nation, by dismissing her French troops, they would then instantly join with their countrymen in compelling her to a measure, which the public safety and the preservation of their liberties" imperatively demanded.* Nor were these dangers imaginary. The superiority of the French troops over the undisciplined forces of the nobility was sufficiently apparent. The subjugation of the entire kingdom might therefore be attempted, with considerable chance of success, by the introduction of an army of adequate strength. Conscious of their own weakness, not less than inspired by a patriotic regard for their country's welfare, the leaders of the congregation, together with the most influential of the Regent's adherents, however they might differ as to their religious opinions, were at one in the adoption of measures which secured the independence and liberties of the kingdom.

At this juncture of affairs, the death of Henry II.

Death of Henry II. took place. This was in every respect an unfortunate circumstance.

Towards the close of his reign, that monarch appears to have entertained juster views as to the state of matters in Scotland, and to have had in contemplation liberal and comprehensive measures, which in all probability would have restored union and tranquillity to that kingdom.† The ascendancy of the house of Guise had visibly declined; their counsels were no longer followed, and, as a natural consequence, they were no longer able to prosecute their ambitious enterprises. The Constable Montmorency, whose influence had formerly been paramount with his master, was, by the assistance of the Duchess of Valentinois, restored to favour. It was by advice of this distinguished minister that Melvil had been dispatched on his mission to Scotland; and the monarch had undertaken to regulate his conduct according to the character of the report which his agent should bring back. But his tragical and untimely end terminated for the present all chances of accommodating matters in Scotland. The accession of Frances II. introduced important changes in the administration of affairs. The Guises were restored to power; and the chief of that house, together with the Cardinal of Lorraine, were intrusted with the government. The schemes which for some time they had been compelled to lay aside, were again resumed, and, in consequence of their advantageous position, pushed forward with activity and vigour, and with greater probability of success. Nothing could exceed the uneasiness and chagria with which the progress of the Reformation had been viewed by this faction. It was easily perceived that its ultimate triumph would oppose insurmountable barriers to the carrying out of their projects; and that so long as Scotland remained Protestant, she would lend no assistance in promoting the dethronement of Elizabeth, and the claims of Mary to the English crown. Stimulated, therefore, by this consideration, they determined upon active measures for the suppression of the reformed movement, and the rendering substantial aid to their relative, the Regent. A change of policy so remarkable was soon communicated to the leaders of the congregation, by means of the correspondence which was constantly kept up with the brethren in France. Cecil, also, was similarly advised; and both parties thus placed upon their guard, prepared to watch the motions of the common enemy, and to meet them with effective resistance. On departing from the capital, in fulfilment of the articles of treaty, proclamations had been issued in name of the Reformers, which set forth that if the Measures of the conditions which were then agreed Reformers.

to, failed to be carried out on the part of the Regent, they would resent their violation, and again assemble their forces for the defence of their friends, and the vindication of their principles. This declaration of their intentions was followed up by the preparation of a new bond, which received the signatures of the most influential of the party, and conferred on the confederacy greater union and strength. The principal article of this bond provided that none of their adherents should receive communications from the Regent without laying them before their brethren, and consulting with them on the proposals which they contained.*

About this time the Reformed party was greatly strengthened by the accession of Arran John the Earl of Arran, eldest son of Reformers. the Duke of Chatelherault. This nobleman had resided for a considerable time in France, where he had commanded the Scottish Guards. His religious views tended to Protestantism, and his sympathies were enlisted in behalf of those who were struggling in Scotland in behalf of religious liberty. The known character of his sentiments rendered him an object of dislike and suspicion to the house of Guise. His conduct was not marked by the caution which was obviously necessary from the peculiar circumstances of his position. Naturally rash and impetuous, he had expressed opinions which gave great offence to a court bigotted in the extreme, and engaged at this very juncture in concocting measures for the suppression of the Reformation in their own country as well as in Scotland. Courts were established in various districts of France, to take cognizance of all who were thought to be tainted with the crime of heresy, and 'several persons of distinction were condemned to the flames.' But the invincible animosity of the princes of Lorraine towards all professors of the reformed faith was not satisfied with these sacrifices; they resolved to mark their determination to extinguish protestantism, by taking signal vengeance on the Earl of Arran for his presumptuous adherence to a cause they abhorred and denounced. Such a measure in relation to so eminent a personage would impress the kingdom in the manner they desired, and strike terror into all hearts. Suspicions of their design being entertained by the earl, on account of some pointed observation of the Cardinal of Lorraine, he immediately retreated from the country, and took refuge in Geneva. His presence, however, was earnestly requested at home, and letters were dispatched to hasten his movements. In his passage through England, he was cordially received by Elizabeth, who, inflaming the resentment he already cherished towards France and the persecuting Guises, dismissed him with many promises of future service. It was evidently her wish that the influence of Arran should be exerted in opposition to the authority of the Regent, and that the duke, his father, should also be detached from the French faction. Sir Ralph Sadler, who was at this time sent on a mission to Scotland, was instructed to exhort the duke, "for preservation of the expectant interest which he hath in the crown, if God call the young queen before she hath issue to withstand the governance of that realm by any other than the blood of Scotland. That upon this principle had acted the King of Spain, who, although husband to the Queen of England, committed no charge of any manner of office, spiritual or temporal, to a stranger; likewise of his father, Charles V., who governed his countries of Flanders and Brabant by their own nation."*

If, as appears to have been the case, the English queen desired that these noblemen should be looked up to as the leaders of the congregation, her expectations on this point were destined to be disappointed. Neither the duke nor his son were calculated for the parts assigned them in the political drama. Their abilities were small; they were destitute of energy, weak-minded, inconstant, and not to be depended on. The times were critical, the circumstances of the Reformers by no means prosperous, the aspects of France threatening, and the conduct of Elizabeth vacillating and cool. Arran was not without ambition, but he was destitute of the capacity necessary for the development of his schemes, and of the firmness and vigour to carry them forward to a successful issue. The actual and acknowledged leader of the reformed party was a man of another stamp, equal to his position, and capable of acquiring and retaining the confidence and affection of his adherents. This was the Lord James, Prior of St. Andrew's, natural son of James V., and afterwards the Regent Moray. In early life, as is plain from his ecclesiastical standing, he was intended for the church. Nature had conferred upon him great and commanding talents; education had developed and matured his intellect; events had brought into play his varied and unquestionable abilities; and his first lessons in war and politics had tended to alienate his mind from the profession which had rather been chosen for him, than selected by himself. The influence of this nobleman at home and abroad, over the minds not only of his own countrymen, but also of the English, and even of foreigners, was commensurate with his remarkable character, which is thus excellently summed up by a modern historian:—"His acquaintance with European politics was superior to most of those with whom he acted, and enabled him to transact business, and conduct his correspondence, with uncommon clearness, brevity, and precision. His knowledge of human nature was profound. He possessed that rapid intuitive insight into the disposition of those with whom he acted, which taught him to select with readiness, and employ with success, those best calculated to forward his designs; and it was his peculiar art to appear to do nothing, whilst in truth, he did all. There was a bluntness, openness, and honesty about his manner which disarmed suspicion, and disposed men to unbosom themselves to him with equal readiness and sincerity. He was brave almost to rashness; his address was dignified; his countenance noble and kingly."* We may add that the general consistency of his conduct, the severe morality of his life, and his sincere attachment to the principles of the reformed religion, contributed much to place him at the head of the reforming party, and to secure for him the ascendancy for which he was distinguished. He was, on several occasions, charged with aspiring to the Scottish crown; and the suspicions which were entertained at the court of France respecting his intentions, appear to have been cherished to a certain extent by the English Queen; for, when Sir Ralph Sadler was sent to Scotland, he was instructed by Cecil to investigate the matter, and if such was found to be his aim, "and the duke be seen to be very cold in his own causes, it shall not be amiss to let him follow his own device therein, without dissuading or persuading him anything therein."† That the imputation was unfounded is proved, not to mention other circumstances, by the unanimity with which his measures were concurred in by the Scottish nobility, the confidence reposed in him by the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earl of Arran, and his own voluntary offer to reside constantly in France, on condition that the public grievances were redressed.‡

* MS. Instructions State Paper Office, 8th August, 1559.

The Protestant chiefs having evacuated Edinburgh, retired to Stirling, from August 3, 1559. which city Knox was sent on a secret mission to Sir James Crofts, Governor of Berwick. On this occasion, many urgent representations were made by him as to the state of matters in Scotland, the measures to be adopted, and the amount of assistance required from the English Queen. He pointed out that Stirling, from its importance as 'the key and principal place,' should be occupied and garrisoned; that a naval force would be required for the safety of Dundee and Perth; that fortifications should be erected at Broughty Craig; that Eyemouth Castle should be seized by the English, to secure it from the French; and that considerable supplies of money, together with men and ships, would be required to carry on the war with any prospects of success. These representations were prepared with the view of being communicated to Sir Henry Percy, and through him to Cecil, the English Secretary of State.* At this time the policy of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth was marked by her characteristic duplicity. She addressed the Regent in letters which expressed her anxiety for the termination of the present commotions, and the continuance of peace between the respective countries; and yet she exerted all her influence in fomenting the disturbances she professed to deplore, urging on the leaders of the congregation the adoption of yet stronger measures, accusing them of inactivity, and taunting them with coldness in supporting the cause they had undertaken to promote. It was doubtless her wish, for state purposes, that affairs in Scotland should remain in an unsettled condition, and accordingly Sir Ralph Sadler was instructed to "nourish the faction between the Scots and the French, so that the French may be better occupied with them, and less busy with England."† Such conduct naturally gave great offence to the reformed party. Strong remonstrances on the subject were addressed to Cecil and Sir James Crofts by the Earl of Argyle and the Lord James. "Ye are not ignorant," said they, "how difficult it is to persuade a multitude to the revolt of an authority established. The last time that we were pursued, our enemies in number were thrice more than we, besides that the castle of Edinburgh declared plain enemy to us at our uttermost necessity, which was one cause of our appointment."‡ The unaccountable delays and suspicions of the English Queen were thus alluded to by Knox, in a letter to the Governor of Berwick:—"I must signify to you, that unless the council be more forward in this common action, ye will utterly discourage the hearts of all here, for they cannot abide the crime of suspicion; they will not trifle; but if they cannot have present support of them, they will seek the next remedy (not that I mean that ever they intend to return to France) to preserve their own bodies, whatsoever become of the country, which our enemies may easily occupy; and when they have so done, make your account of what may ensue towards yourself." §

The irresolute and temporizing measures of Elizabeth are by no means inexplicable. It may be questioned without injustice to that princess, whether she had really at heart the establishment of the Reformation in Scotland. Her tendencies towards Romanism are well known. Whether, of her own individual opinions had been carried out, the Reformed religion would have been settled in England, may be well doubted. Whatever may have been her real sentiments, she was called to the throne on the understanding that her principles were in harmony with those of the majority of her people. Thus much, however, is certain, that the anti-practical opinions of Knox were utterly repugnant to her own views; that the reformer himself was an object of contempt and hatred, and this, not only on account of the severity of his religious principles, but of a book which he had lately published containing some strong statements on the subject of female government. Her aversion to him was excessive. She refused his apologies and concessions, she prohibited his appearance in her dominions, and even interdicted him from preaching in some of the northern counties. These circumstances partially explain her indifference to the repeated applications for aid transmitted to her through her secretary, Cecil. At the same time she could not conceal from herself the importance of providing occupation for the French at the expense of Scotland. Amusing the Reformers, therefore, with promises which were easily made and as easily broken, she encouraged their revolt against the supreme authority. Dreading the ambitious schemes of the house of Guise, indignant at the assumption by Mary of her title and arms, she regarded with alarm the prospect of an alliance between the two countries, and the effect upon her Roman Catholic subjects of the establishment of French influence in Scotland.

In answer to a letter from Cecil, quoted above, advising the Reformers to enrich themselves with the spoils of the Romish church, it was replied by the Lord James:—"We are not ignorant that our enemies, the Popish kirkmen, are crafty, rich, malicious, and bloodthirsty, and most gladly would we have their riches otherwise bestowed. But consider, sir, that we have against us the established authority, which did ever favour you and us; and without support, we cannot bring them to such obedience as we desire. We cannot but persuade all men to favour our cause, and of our authority we have established a council; but suddenly to discharge this authority till that ye and we be fully persuaded, it is not thought expedient." ¶ The necessities of the Reformers, their necessities and demands on England for substantial assistance, are fully unfolded in the following important letter from Knox to the Secretary of State:—"The state of these gentlemen standeth thus: that unless without delay money be furnished to pay their soldiers, who in numbers are now but five hundred, for their service by past, and to retain another thousand footmen, with three hundred horsemen for a time, they will be compelled every man to seek the next way for his own safety. I am assured (as flesh may be of flesh) that some of them will take a very hard life before that ever they compone either with the Queen-regent or with France; but this I dare not promise of all, unless in you they see greater forwardness for their support. To aid us so liberally as we require to some of you will appear excessive, and to displease France to many will appear dangerous; but, sir, I hope that ye consider that our destruction will be your greatest loss, and that when France shall be our full master (which God avert) they will be but slender friends to you. Lord Bettancourt bragged in his credit, after he had delivered his menacing letter to the Prior (Lord James), that the king and his council would spend the crown of France, unless they had our full obedience. I am assured, that unless they had a farther respect, they would not buy our poverty at that price. They labour to corrupt some of our great men with money; and some of our number are so poor that without support they cannot serve. Some they threaten, and against others they have raised up a party in their own country. In this meantime, if you lie as manacled, what will be the end you may easily conclude. Some of the council, after the sight of your letters, immediately departed, not well appeased. The Earl of Argyle is gone to his country for putting order to the same, and mindeth shortly to return with his force, if assurance be had of your support; and likewise will the gentlemen in these lower parts put themselves in readiness to enterprise the uttermost, if ye will assist with them; and, therefore, in the bowels of Christ Jesus, I require you, sir, to make plain answer what they may lippen* to, and at what time their support shall be in readiness. Some danger is in the drift of time, in such matters ye are not ignorant. It was much marvelled that the queen's majesty wrote no manner of answer, considering that her good father, the most noble and redoubted of his time, disdained not lovingly to write to men fewer in number and far inferior in authority and power than those be that wrote to her grace.†

In order to understand the urgency of this remonstrance, we must consider the new aspect which the affairs of the Regent had at this juncture assumed. Her repeated applications to France were at length attended with success. In the commencement of August the Sieur de Bettancourt had arrived in Scotland, and assured the queen that a French army was about to be dispatched to her assistance. Accordingly, at the end of the month, an Italian officer landed at the port of Leith with a force of a thousand men.

This was a seasonable but very inadequate supply. Octavian, their commander, was, therefore, immediately sent back to France to solicit further reinforcements. He was instructed to urge on behalf of the Regent that the Reformers were daily receiving fresh accessions of strength; that their leaders were soliciting aid, and would probably obtain it, from England and Germany; and that, with another thousand men, a hundred barbed horse, together with four ships of war, she had no doubt her opponents might be kept in check, if not altogether subdued.

Subsequent to the landing of the French forces there arrived at the Scottish court the Bishop of Amiens and two doctors of the Sorbonne, whose mission, according to profession, was for the peaceful purpose of holding disputations; but, according to appearance, was rather of a more warlike character, as they were attended by La Brosse, a French officer, two hundred men, and a company of eighty horse. Twelve of the principal nobility being then in Edinburgh, they were invited by the bishop to appoint a day when their demands might be stated and considered. To this challenge it was at once replied that if it was the purpose of the bishop and his coadjutors to argue the question, they must send back their troops, as no controversies could be decided with the presence on either side of armed forces. This prelate exercised a pernicious influence on the counsels of the Regent. It was expressly stipulated by the late convention that the cathedral of St. Giles should remain in the hands of the Protestants; but the Bishop, a furious bigot, and servilely attached to the house of Guise, induced the Queen-mother to violate her promise; and, taking possession of St. Giles, she ordered it to be again solemnly consecrated and the rites of the Romish Church to be re-established.

No sooner had the French reinforcements arrived, than the queen took possession of Leith is fortified Leith, which, from its vicinity to ^{by order of the} Regent. Edinburgh, and its excellent harbour, was a place of much importance. The seizure of this port, and the manner in which it was executed, excited the popular indignation. Not only were fortifications commenced, but, in order to provide quarters for the troops, many of the inhabitants were turned out of their houses and compelled to evacuate the town. Remonstrances, by order of the congregation, were addressed to the Regent by the Duke of Chatelherault, to whom she replied contemptuously: "It is as meet and lawful for the queen, my daughter, in whose behalf I act, to fortify any place she listeth in her own realm, as for you to build at Hamilton; nor will I desist at your bidding." Matters being thus hastened forward to a crisis, the Reformers, as we have seen, dispatched urgent representations to Elizabeth, setting forth their position, and requesting immediate assistance. This princess, being now convinced that without aid they could not proceed further, at once responded to their call. In consequence of recent treaties it was impossible for her openly to counte-

their proceedings were somewhat abrupt, they were not destitute of solemnity. Strangers to those forms which obstruct business, unacquainted with the arts which make a figure in debate, and much more fitted for action than discourse, a warlike people always hasten to a conclusion, and bring their deliberations to the shortest issue. It was the work but of one day to examine and resolve this nice question, concerning the behaviour of subjects towards a ruler who abuses his power." The clergy having been called upon to declare their opinions, a speech was delivered by Willock on the nature of the "Divine Ordinance of Magistracy," and its limitations, as defined by the Word of God. He adverted to the precepts and examples of Scripture, and maintained that it was lawful for subjects not only to resist tyrannical princes, but to deprive them of authority. He denounced the Regent as an oppressor, who had refused them justice, withheld from them their rights, and was now attempting to destroy their liberties. For himself, he avowed that no other sentence than that of deposition would satisfy his own mind.* Knox followed, and in a solemn and impressive manner delivered his sentiments. He could not disapprove, he said, of the decision which had now been intimated, but earnestly exhorted them to consider that the unworthiness of the Regent furnished no plea for the withdrawal of their allegiance or affections from their legitimate sovereigns. He warned them to anticipate the severest judgments of God, if in this matter they were actuated by other motives than zeal for the Protestant religion, and a desire to preserve from invasion the liberties and independence of the realm. And, lastly, he required that no such sentence should be pronounced against her, but that upon her open repentance she should be restored to those honours of which, for just causes, she might now be deprived.† The judgment of the assembly was now given in the most formal and emphatic manner. The votes were individually taken, and without a dissentient voice the Regent was deposed from her office, an instrument to this effect drawn up, and proclamation made of the same at the Cross of Edinburgh. Immediately afterwards, the Lion herald was commissioned with a letter to the Queen, to inform her of this decision.

This document declares:—"We plainly perceive, by the letters and mandates sent us by your herald, your persevering aversion to the true worship of God, and the public welfare of the nation, and our common liberty. In order, therefore, to preserve them, we, in the name of our King and Queen, suspend and prohibit you from exercising the government in their name, as Regent, or under whatever title you may assume, as we are assured that your proceedings are in entire opposition to their wishes for the welfare of this kingdom. And as your grace will not acknowledge us, our sovereign lord and lady's true barons, for your subjects and council, no more will we acknowledge you for any regent or lawful magistrate unto us; seeing, if any authority ye have, by reason of our sovereign's commission granted unto your grace, the same, for most weighty reasons, is worthily suspended by us, and by name and authority of our sovereigns, whose council we are, of native birth, in the affairs of this our commonwealth."*

The bold measure which the leaders of the congregation had adopted in depriving the Queen-regent of her authority was followed up by a summons to all the French and Scottish soldiers to quit the town of Leith within twelve hours. As a matter of course, this order was treated with contempt by the queen's party; preparations were therefore made for an assault upon the town, and scaling-ladders were ordered to be made in the isles of the church of St. Giles, to the interruption of public worship and the great displeasure of the preachers, who regarded this occurrence as an omen of failure in their enterprise. Division indeed had already broken out in their Divisions among ranks. The Queen-mother had the confederated tampered with some of the leaders, ^{barons.} and had succeeded in detaching them from the cause, and the secret counsels of the confederated lords were treacherously betrayed to her. As the money which had been sent from the English court was now spent, the soldiers clamoured for their arrears of wages, and broke out into an open mutiny;‡ and the vassals of the barons who served without pay were unable to keep the field, and began to return to their homes. In this emergency it was agreed that the confederated nobles should give up their silver plate to be coined into money; but the workmen of the mint absconded, and carried off with them the instruments of coinage, so that this expedient failed. The only resource that remained was to solicit assistance from England; and accordingly an application for money was made to Sir Ralph Sadler and Sir James Crofts, the governors of Berwick, who sent four thousand crowns by Cockburn of Ormiston, a zealous adherent of the congregation. But the Regent had in some way obtained notice of this, and at her instigation Cockburn was treacherously waylaid and robbed of the whole sum by the notorious Earl of Bothwell, although he had at this period professed great attachment to the cause of the Reformers.‡

Meanwhile, in order to rouse the depressed spirits of the party, it was resolved to Assault upon press the siege of Leith with vigour, ^{Leith.} and some pieces of artillery were planted on an eminence near Holyrood, under the command of James Halyburton, Provost of Dundee, one of the ablest military leaders of the congregation. The

Regent, however, having received information from one of her secret adherents in Edinburgh, that, on the last day of October, all the leading men of the party had gone to attend sermon, which would last till noon, issued orders to a chosen body of her French guard to make a sortie from Leith, and seize the artillery. This attack met with complete success. The Scotch were defeated with considerable loss, and their leader besiegers. Halyburton was killed; the French pursued the fugitives as far as the Canongate and the foot of Leith Wynd, and cruelly murdered in cold blood several aged persons and a woman with an infant at her breast. On their return to Leith, loaded with the plunder which they had carried off from the houses of the poor citizens, they were cordially received by the Queen-regent, who, says Knox, "sat upon the rampart to salute and welcome her victorious soldiers. One brought a kirtle, another a petticoat, the third a pot or a pan; and of envy, more than womanly laughter, she asked, 'Where bought ye your ware? I guess ye have purchased that without money.' This was the great and motherly care which she took for the trouble of the poor subjects of this realm."*

On the 6th November the French made another sally from Leith for the purpose of intercepting a supply of provisions and stores for the congregation. The Earl of Arran and Lord James Stewart attacked them at the head of a small force, and compelled them to retire. But the French, having received reinforcements, renewed the combat, and the Scots, becoming entangled in the marshes betwixt Restalrig and the royal park, were defeated, and narrowly escaped being cut to pieces. The leaders of the congregation were so much disheartened by this second reverse, that they resolved to abandon the capital without delay; and accordingly, amid the shouts and insults of many of the citizens whom the recent disasters had alienated from their cause,† they quitted the city at midnight, and retired to Stirling.‡

In this day of darkness and distress, Knox alone seems to have 'bated not a jot of heart or hope,' and his spirit-stirring exhortations contributed greatly to support his perplexed and dispirited friends. Two days after their retreat to Stirling, he preached a sermon to the congregation on the 80th Psalm, in which he shewed that the happiness of the people of God was not to be measured by external appearances, since it frequently happened that He fed them with the bread of affliction, and gave them tears to drink in great measure, while the ignorant and idolatrous heathen were living in peace and plenty. He pointed out the sin they had committed in trusting too much to an arm of flesh; reminded them of the holiness and humility which they displayed at the beginning of the struggle, when they had only God for their protection, and warned them to take care lest they should trust more to the power and dignity of their leader, the Duke of Châtellerault, than to the favour of God and the justice of their cause. Then turning to the duke himself, he reminded him of the sin he had committed in hesitating so long to join the Reformers, and in giving assistance to their enemies. "I am uncertain," said he, "if my lord's grace hath unfeignedly repented of his assistance given to the murderers who unjustly pursued us. I am uncertain if he hath repented of the innocent blood of Christ's martyrs, which was shed through his default. But let it be that so he hath done (as I hear he hath confessed his offences before the lords and brethren of the congregation), yet sure I am that neither he nor his friends did feel, before this time, the anguish and grief of heart which we felt when their blind fury pursued us; and, therefore, hath God justly permitted both them and us to fall in this confusion, as because we put our confidence in man, and them to make them feel how bitter was that cup which they had made others to drink before them. What then remaineth, but that both they and we turn to the eternal—our God, who beateth down to death that he may raise up again, to leave behind the remembrance of his wondrous deliverance to the praise of his own name, which if we do unfeignedly I no more doubt that this our delour confusion and fear shall be turned into joy, honour, and boldness, than I doubt that God gave victory to the Israelites after they were twice with ignominious repulsed and driven back. Be assured," said he in conclusion, "that this cause, whatever becomes of us and our mortal carcasses, shall, in despite of Satan, prevail in this realm of Scotland. It is the eternal truth of God, and however for the time oppressed, must in the end be triumphant."*

The condition of the Reformers rendered it now imperative that prompt measures should be taken for their immediate relief. Their resources were exhausted, and, having gone too far to render retreat possible, their destruction appeared inevitable. In this extremity, the leaders of the congregation having met in council, determined to dispatch Maitland of Lethington to lay before the Queen of England the desperate state of their affairs, and to implore her assistance. As it was impossible in the meantime to keep the field they agreed to dismiss their forces, and to disperse themselves in different directions. After having dined on the 16th of December as the time for their re-assembling at Stirling, this plan was carried into execution. The Earl of Arran, the Lord James, the Earl of Rothes, and the Master of Lindsay, retired into Fife. The Duke of Châtellerault, with the Earl of Glencairn and the Lords Boyd and Ochiltree, continued in Glasgow. Edinburgh being thus evacuated by the Reformers, was entered without delay by the Queen-mother. Anxious to obtain possession of the castle, she summoned it to surrender; and when this was refused, she alternately employed threats and promises to compass her end. All her efforts, however, were without success. The governor, Lord Erskine, was a stout soldier, who was not to be either seduced by flattery, or terrified into compliance with her wishes. In a peremptory manner he declared that the castle had been delivered into his keeping by the parliament of Scotland, and nothing but an order from the three Estates would induce him to abandon his charge.*

While Maitland was absent on his embassy, movements of the French exerted themselves to the utmost to destroy the party of their opponents, and thus terminate the war before the arrival of the English auxiliaries. They were the more stimulated to this course, as intelligence had reached them that great preparations were making in France for sending over reinforcements to their friends. It appeared certain also that Elizabeth would assist the Protestants, and that if they did not anticipate the arrival of this succour, they might be placed in a difficult position. They resolved to proceed first against the party which had retired to Fife. On their march they ravaged the country of the Hamiltons, and attacked Linlithgow. From thence they proceeded to Stirling, plundering wherever they came, and exciting consternation in the minds of the inhabitants. In order to put a stop, if possible, to their progress, a garrison was placed in Dysart. Here they were engaged in skirmishing for some days; and in one of their incursions into the country they destroyed the Grange, the seat of Kirkaldy. Soon after this they met with a signal disaster. An ambush was successfully formed by Kirkaldy, and an officer named L'Abbas, together with his company, fell into the snare. The enemy, finding that they were cut off from their friends, took refuge in a village which was near, and endeavoured to defend themselves behind the walls and hedges. The Scots, enraged by the former cruelties of the French, disregarding their own safety, in their eagerness to injure their enemies, although they had no other weapons than horsemen's lances, rushed within the place, and overthrew all before them. The captain, refusing to surrender, was slain, with fifty soldiers, and the rest were sent prisoners to Dundee.† At this time, also, the French auxiliaries were encountered by the Prior of St. Andrew's, Lord Ruthven, and a few of the more spirited leaders of the congregation. "Having assembled six hundred horse they infested the French with continual incursions, beat up their quarters, intercepted their convoys of provisions, cut off their straggling parties, and so effectually harassed them with perpetual alarms that they prevented them from advancing for more than three weeks." At last, this small but brave party were compelled to retreat, and the enemy advancing from Kirkaldy moved in the direction of St. Andrew's. Having marched for a few miles along the sea-coast, and reached the promontory of Kinraig, they perceived a powerful fleet sailing up the Frith of Forth. As they were now in expectation of receiving assistance from their own country, conducted by the Marquis D'Elbeuf, they concluded that these were the ships which conveyed his army, and were filled with exultation at the spectacle before them. To testify their joy a great number of cannon were fired, and the day was devoted to amusement and the exchange of mutual congratulations. Their rejoicings, however, were premature, as they were speedily informed that the fleet they had just saluted was from England, and that the army which was intended to co-operate with it was at no great distance from the Scottish borders. They were so much alarmed at these tidings that they resolved immediately to re-join their comrades on the south of the Forth, and, after a circuitous and toilsome march by Stirling, in the midst of a snow-storm, they succeeded in reaching Leith on the third day, having lost a number of men by the way, through the inclemency of the weather and the attacks of the Scottish cavalry, under the Lord James, by whom they were dreadfully harassed.*

The success of Maitland had been proportionate to his wishes. The cause of the congregation, indeed, did not require much advocacy at his hands. Elizabeth had already determined to afford them substantial assistance. This resolution had been taken by the advice of her secretary, Cecil. With his usual sagacity and penetration, he had always regarded the interference of the Queen of England as not only advisable but necessary. His views in regard to the position of affairs at the present crisis are ably embodied in two state papers, entitled, "A Short Discussion of the Weighty Affairs of Scotland," which are still extant in his own handwriting. The motives which should urge the queen to countenance and aid the Reformers are in these documents laid down with admirable clearness and great force. He pointed out that the French were the ancient and implacable enemies of England. No treaty of peace which had been formed between them had ever been sincere or permanent. Nothing, therefore, was to be expected from the late convention, which was only consented to on account of the weakness of their armies, and the exhausted state of their treasury. As soon as their affairs should attain to a more prosperous condition, the articles of peace would be broken on the slightest pretence. The French monarch, he observed, was influenced by the pernicious counsels of the house of Guise, and that house was ever distinguished for its animosity to England. They had openly called in question the legitimacy of his royal mistress, "and by advancing the title and pretensions of the Queen of Scotland, studied to deprive Elizabeth of her crown." England could with most advantage be invaded through Scotland; and if the French were successful in extinguishing the party of the Reformers, their next step would be to take measures for the dethronement of Elizabeth, and the restoration in her kingdom of the Popish religion. Her best policy was to arrest the progress of the enemy, and by supporting the Congregation with a powerful army, at once render the triumph of the French impossible, and put a stop to the further prosecution of the designs which were now being matured by the Princes of Lorraine.* These counsels being supported by the strong representations of Maitland, were adopted by the queen; and intelligence was accordingly conveyed to the Reformers on the 15th of December, by Robert Melvil, who had accompanied Lethington to the English court, that preparations were now making for the equipment of a fleet, and the assembling of such a force as would enable them without delay to take the field against the enemy.

Every precaution was taken by Elizabeth to conceal from the Queen-regent the real character of the measures she was now adopting. In their applications for assistance the Reformers were directed to make no mention of religion. They were instructed to express their apprehensions of the French, whose designs pointed to the subversion of the independence of Scotland, and through the conquest of that kingdom to the dethronement of Elizabeth. "Most true it is," say they, "that this practice of the French is not attempted only against this kingdom of Scotland, but also against the crown and kingdom of England and Ireland; for we know most certainly that the French have devised to spread abroad, though most falsely, that our queen is right heir to England and Ireland; and to notify the same to the world, have, in paintings, at public jousts, in France and other places, this year, caused the arms of England, contrary to all right, to be borne quarterly with the arms of Scotland, meaning nothing less than any augmentation to Scotland, but to annex them both perpetually to the crown of France."† Early in December the Reformers, having received a seasonable supply of money, were enabled to levy an additional force of one thousand foot and two hundred horse. At Glasgow, the Duke of Chatelherault actively employed himself in the suppression of idolatrous practices, taking possession of the archbishop's palace, and destroying the altars, images, and relics with which the churches were furnished. But the archbishop having procured the assistance of some French soldiers, recovered the castle and expelled the followers of the Duke.‡ About the close of November, proclamations were issued in Glasgow, professedly in the name of Francis and Mary, King and Queen of Scots, to the effect, that the whole authority of the Regent had been devolved upon the reformed lords of the Privy Council, and warning their subjects against the consequences of refusing to submit to the new government. Their only aim, it was further declared, was the glory of God and the destruction of idolatry. And, in order to the accomplishment of these ends, all clergymen who had not yet tendered their adherence to the new faith, were commanded, under the penalty of forfeiting their benefices, and being declared enemies of God, to repair to St. Andrew's, and appear before the council there assembled.* Following up this proceeding, the council of the Congregation at Dundee issued, in the name of the king and queen, strong denunciations against the consistory court, which they denominated the court of Antichrist, prohibited its future meetings, and interdicted "such wicked persons as had dared to disobey this injunction, from any repetition of their offences under pain of death."†

On the arrival in the Forth of the English fleet, the French ambassador, De Sevre, was dispatched by the Regent to demand the reason of this invasion in a time of peace. The answer of the admiral, Winter was to the effect that "his intentions were pacific, and having gone to sea in search of pirates, he had entered the Forth to watch for them there."‡ To this De Sevre replied, "that what chiefly gave discontentment to his court was, the aid which the Queen of England had given to the Scottish rebels." On the part of Elizabeth, it was immediately retorted, "that she could not consider the nobility and nation of Scotland as rebels; but, on the contrary, she deemed them wise and faithful subjects to the crown of Scotland, since they had ventured to offend the French king, in defence of the rights of his wife, their sovereign. And truly, if these barons should permit the government of their kingdom to be wrested out of their hands during the absence of their queen—if they tamely gave up the independence of their native country, whilst she used the counsel, not of the Scots, but solely of the French—her mother and other foreigners being her advisers in Scotland, and the Cardinal and Duke of Guise in France—it were a good cause for the world to speak shame of now. Nay, if the young queen herself should happen to survive her husband, she would, in such a case, have just occasion to redden them all as cowards and unnatural subjects."§ Shortly after this answer had been returned to the instances of the Regent, the Duke of Norfolk arrived in Berwick, to hold a conference with the lords of the Congregation, who were represented by Maitland, Balnave, Pitarrow, and Lord Ruthven. At this meeting a treaty was concluded, according to the terms of which Elizabeth bound herself to support the cause of the Reformers, to furnish them with money and a powerful army, to aid them in expelling the French out of the country, and never to abandon them so long as they continued faithful in their allegiance to their legitimate sovereign and maintained inviolate the rights of the crown. On the other hand, it was promised by the commissioners that their forces should be united with those of England; that if the latter country should be invaded they would assist Elizabeth with an army of four thousand men; that no other union with France than that which already existed would ever receive their sanction; and they protested their intention to continue in their loyalty to the Queen of Scotland and the King, her husband, in "everything which did not tend to the overthrow of the ancient laws and liberties of the kingdom." They promised, in the last place, that hostages should be given as a guarantee for the performance of these articles.*

These terms being satisfactorily arranged, and the hostages having arrived at Berwick, the English army, consisting of two thousand horse and six thousand foot, under the command of Lord Grey, crossed the Borders on the 2nd of April, 1560. At Preston they were joined by the army of the Congregation, numbering about eight thousand men, and conducted by the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earls of Argyll, Glencairn, and Monteith, and the Lord James. The united forces having advanced rapidly from Preston to Restalrig, were encountered there by the French cavalry, when, after a short but sharp contest, the latter were compelled to retire with the loss of forty men and a hundred prisoners. Measures were immediately adopted by the English general for the siege of Leith. His army was encamped on the fields to the south and south-east of that seaport. Winter, the English admiral, opened a cannonade from the fleet, and a battery of eight guns, firing on the land-side, speedily silenced those which the French had mounted on the steeple of St. Anthony. Partial successes have ever a tendency to induce self-confidence and a relaxation of discipline. Taking ad-

Failure of the advantage of this, a sally was made on Leith. by the French, under the conduct of Martignes, who boldly attacked the English trenches, forced their opponents to give way, spiked three cannon, and put to the sword six hundred men.†

This defeat was a source of severe discouragement to the reformed party. They were further disheartened by the coldness and continued neutrality of some of the principal barons who had engaged to assist them. In order to account for this, it must be remembered that the position of many of these barons was difficult and trying. On the one hand, their attachment to the ancient faith remained unshaken; while on the other, they were indignant at the continued presence in the country of the French forces, jealous of the ascendancy of French counsels, and anxious for the preservation of the liberties and independence of the kingdom. So long as it was possible to refrain from countenancing the Reformers, without endangering the interests of Scotland, they remained passive, and refused to embroil themselves in the contentions of the day. This was the course pursued in particular by the Earl of Huntly, a Roman Catholic nobleman of immense influence, and possessed of almost regal power in the northern counties. Having entered into an agreement with the lords of the Congregation to assist them with his adherents, he had delayed the fulfilment of his promises, watching the progress of events, and calculating the probabilities of success before he declared himself; and he now entered into a separate treaty, by which he stipulated for the preservation of his authority and the security of his possessions. On this subject some new and interesting facts have been brought to light by the investigations of a modern historian. It appears that the French had acquired such considerable influence in the northern parts of the realm, that they had succeeded in persuading certain nobles and clans to enter into a common league, by which they agreed to defend with their whole power the Roman Catholic faith, and to maintain the French authority within the kingdom. Huntly had been deterred for a long period from carrying out his engagements with the Reformers, influenced by the fear—not unnatural in the circumstances—that any decided steps in this direction would immediately expose him to the resentment and attacks of the combined members of this league. Re-assured, however, by promises The Reformers of support from the lords, he openly are joined by avowed his adherence to their Huntly. cause, and, accompanied by sixty horse, entered their camp on the 25th of April.*

At this period the Queen-regent, who on the advance of the English forces to Leith had retired to Edinburgh, and placed herself under the protection of Lord Erskine, governor of the castle, was visited by the Bishop of Valence, a commissioner from the court of France, with instructions to attempt negotiations between the two factions. Having held a conference with her for two days, he endeavoured to obtain an interview with the lords of the Congregation. This they were highly indisposed to grant, and only consented at the request of the English queen. But the attempted mediation completely failed. The prelate insisted that the basis of any agreement must be an express renunciation of the league with England. To this it was answered that no such measure could be adopted without the consent of Elizabeth; but that if he could show that this league was in any way inconsistent with their allegiance to their sovereign, or prejudicial to the liberties of Scotland, it would be at once abandoned. On their part it was required, as the fundamental article of any treaty, that the fortifications of Leith should be at once demolished, and the French compelled to quit the country. This condition was peremptorily refused by the bishop, and the negotiations were in consequence broken off.

Elizabeth having dispatched reinforcements to the camp before Leith, Lord Grey determined to press the siege with greater vigour, the more so as the town was now suffering from famine. On the 4th of May the English set fire to the water-mills; the one they burned in the morning and next day they destroyed the other, notwithstanding the efforts of the French to extinguish the flames. On the 7th failure of the assault a general assault was made, but, in spite of the greatest exertions on the part of the troops, the attempt failed. Their positions were improperly chosen, their scaling ladders were too short, and they were but ill supported. They were in consequence repulsed, with the loss of a hundred and sixty men. The unfortunate issue of this attack may be traced in a great measure to the treachery of Sir James Crofts, who, having been entrusted with a division for the storming of the quarter nearest the sea, culpably delayed his advance till his assistance was rendered unavailing by the defeat of his associates. Encouraged by this partial success, the Regent again attempted the renewal of negotiations. Requesting an interview with the Earls of Huntly and Glencairn, she was waited upon instead, by Lethington, the Lord James, the Master of Maxwell, and Lord Ruthven, who declared that on the single condition of the departure from the kingdom of the French forces they would disband their troops, acknowledge her authority, and refer all other subjects of dispute to the decision of parliament. Terms so moderate would not, there is reason to believe, have been rejected by the queen, if she had been permitted to exercise her own judgment and to act upon her own responsibility. But this was impossible. Her connection with her French advisers rendered it imperative that they should be consulted. The request which she made that the matter might be laid before La Brosse, D'Ossell, and the Bishop of Amiens, was refused by the barons, and the conference was abruptly closed.*

The health of the Queen-regent had for some time been in a very precarious state. On this account she had contemplated retiring from the cares of office, and returning to her native France, there to spend the remainder of her days in peace and quiet. That such a resolution had been adopted and communicated to her daughter appears from the following commission, executed at Blois, by Francis and Mary, on the 4th of December, 1559, constituting their uncle, René, Marquis d'Elbœuf, Regent of Scotland, "in place of their beloved lady mother, Queen-regent, who, on account of her infirm state of health, perceiving herself incapable of the fatigue of state affairs, desires to withdraw privately from Scotland into France, for change of air and milder climate, meaning to come at her first convenient opportunity by easy journeys, as she can bear it, in order to obtain rest and relaxation for awhile, for the burden and vexation she has endured both by day and night, of care and conflicts which have entirely destroyed her health. For this necessary reason, they, her children, are desirous to receive her in France, and to commit the government of the realm, during her absence, into efficient hands for restraining the turbulence of the nobles, and protecting their subjects; and, for his many noble qualities, have made choice of the said Duke of Lorraine, their dearest uncle." Her last public act was to issue a proclamation commanding the parliament to convene on the 8th of July, for the purpose of composing the unhappy differences in the country, and arranging a treaty to include England, France, and Scotland. The day she had thus fixed, however, she did not live to see. During her residence in the castle she had been attacked by frequent fits of sickness, which undermined her constitution and prostrated her strength. Finding herself at the point of death, she requested a last interview with the lords of the Congregation. Accordingly, she was at once visited by the Duke of Chatelherault, the Earls of Argyle, Marischal, and Glencairn, and the Lord James. Both parties were equally affected at this solemn interview, and, in spite of their hostility to her government, the spectacle of the dying princess moved to tears the hardy barons who had been her most zealous opponents. She expressed her grief for the troubles that distracted the kingdom; and earnestly implored the nobles to conclude a peace, and to send out of the country both the English and the French forces. She advised them to a faithful observance of the ancient league with France, which had lately been confirmed in so special a manner by the marriage of Francis with their own sovereign. She expressed in pathetic terms her love and affection to the country and the people of Scotland, and exhorted the nobles to provide for their own and the nation's liberties. She professed her sorrow for having compelled them to seek support from any other than their own queen, and for having brought matters to such extremities, which she said were owing to the pernicious counsels of the Earl of Huntly and her French advisers, who had prevented her agreeing, as she wished, to the terms proposed at the conference held in France. "After many such endearing expressions, she at last burst forth into tears, asking pardon of all those whom she had in any way offended, and most heartily forgiving those who had offended her, wishing them also pardon and forgiveness at the hand of God. And, the more to demonstrate her love and affection, she embraced, and with a smiling countenance kissed the nobles one by one, and to those of inferior rank who stood by, she gave her hand to kiss, as a token of her kindness and dying charity." Much feeling was manifested by the barons towards the expiring queen, and imparting to her what comfort they could, they requested that she would send for Willock, a distinguished preacher of the Reformed faith. To this she readily consented, and Willock, a mild but faithful minister of Christ, having pressed upon her the only way of salvation, as well as the vanity of the mass, "she did openly confess that there was no salvation but in and by the death of Jesus Christ; but of the mass we heard not her confession."* She died on the 11th of June, 1560, "and," says Archbishop Spottiswood, "she ended her life most Christianly."† It is not necessary to delineate the character of this princess at any length. The facts of her history speak for themselves. Her natural talents were excellent, her intellect clear, her disposition gentle and humane. Her capacity for government was undoubtedly great, and many judicious measures characterised the commencement of her reign, and secured for her the confidence of the nobility and the affections of the people. But in after years she became the tool of France, and the instrument of the unprincipled ambition of the princes of Lorraine. No longer influenced by the dictates of her own sound judgment, she allowed herself to be swayed by the pernicious counsels of the house of Guise, and thus outlived to a great extent her reputation and popularity. "Her death," says Buchanan, "variously affected the minds of men, for some of them who fought against her did yet bewail her death, for she was indued with a singular wit, and had also a mind very propense to equity. She had quieted the fiercest Highlanders and the farthest inhabitants of the Isles by her wisdom and valour. Some believed that she would never have had any war with the Scots if she had been left free to her own disposition, for she so accommodated herself to their manners, that she seemed able to accomplish all things without force."‡

Mary of Lorraine expired in the forty-fifth year of her age and the sixth of her regency. Her body, by her own desire, was transported to France after an interval of several months, and buried in the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, at Rheims, in Champagne, of which her sister Renée Lorraine was then Abbess.§

The French forces, shut up in the town of Leith, were at this period reduced to the last extremity of distress. They had suffered much from famine; and the failure of all supplies necessary to enable them to hold out, rendered it apparent that nothing could now save them but the immediate conclusion of a peace, or the arrival of powerful reinforcements from the continent. Whatever expectations might have been formed as to the arrival of the latter, they were destined to disappointment. Amusing their party in Scotland with liberal promises of large and speedy assistance, the princes of Lorraine had no intention of giving effect to their professions. Nor, indeed, was it in their power to comply with the demands which were made upon them. The condition of France imperatively claimed their undivided attention. That country was the seat of popular commotions, distracted by religious dissensions, and weakened by frequent conspiracies; and the consequent position of affairs gave great uneasiness to the court and monarch. The Protestants were now a party formidable by their number, and the influence and genius of their principal leaders. Treated with extreme severity by Francis II. and his advisers, the house of Guise, who had openly avowed their determination to extinguish heresy, and persecute to the death its adherents, they were not on that account dismayed, but, on the contrary, resolved to secure their own safety by anticipating the designs of their enemies. Hence, among others, the famous conspiracy of Amboise, which, however, through the vigilance of their adversaries, was detected and rendered abortive. It was evident that this attempt would shortly be succeeded by others more desperate and probably more successful in their results, and that to counteract these plots would require all their energies. The attention of the French government being thus concentrated on their own country, they became desirous to conclude a peace, and to withdraw their forces from the Scottish kingdom. On the other hand, Elizabeth was not less anxious for the termination of hostilities. She had consented to become a party in the war with evident reluctance, and, even after she had dispatched her army to the assistance of the Congregation, she employed all her efforts to effect an amicable settlement with the French court. The Reformers were also desirous of peace, from motives the urgency of which admitted of no dispute. The struggle had proved too severe and too protracted for their limited forces and exhausted treasury. It was found to be impracticable to keep their followers together for any length of time, and to preserve the order and discipline so essential to the organization and efficiency of a body of troops. Mercenaries had been hired, but these could never be depended on, and now that their pay had fallen into arrear, they were proving refractory, and showing themselves ready to mutiny and to sell their services to the enemy. France had been found a more formidable opponent than was at first anticipated. All their operations at Leith had signally failed, and Lethington acknowledged in one of his letters that its fortifications were so strong that, if well victualled, it might safely defy an army of twenty thousand men. All parties were thus prepared and anxious for the commencement of negotiations. In these circumstances, a commission was granted by Francis and Mary to John Moluc, Bishop of Valence, Nicolas Bishop of Amiens, La Brosse, D'Osell, and the Sieur de Randan, to proceed to Scotland and arrange the conditions of a treaty to include respectively Scotland, England, and France.

Arriving at Edinburgh in the month of June, they were met by Cecil, the minister of Elizabeth, and Sir Nicholas Wotton, Dean of Canterbury, who had 'grown old in the art of negotiating under three successive monarchs.' Two great interests required to be consulted in the treaty about to be concluded: the interests on the one hand of France and England, and on the other of the lords of the Congregation. No difficulty was experienced in the adjustment of the former. The only obstacle of any importance was the unjust assumption on the part of Mary and her husband of the title and arms of the Queen of England; and the French ambassadors at once consented that these should be renounced, and that the claims of Elizabeth to receive compensation for the injury she had thereby sustained, should be a question reserved for after consideration. Further, as France agreed to withdraw her forces from Scotland, the other points in dispute were easily settled, and matters accommodated to the satisfaction of both parties. To provide for the interests of the lords of the Congregation, however, was another and more delicate task. They had combined together for the expulsion of the French forces; they had entered unlawfully (so it was alleged) into a treaty with the English queen, who had assisted them with men and money; they had avowed their resolution to overthrow the established religion; they had attacked and destroyed ecclesiastical edifices; they had appeared in arms against their natural sovereign, inasmuch as they had deposed the Queen-regent from the exercise of her legitimate authority, and had assumed the supreme power, not only without any commission from their queen, but contrary to her express injunctions. They were regarded by the French as nothing better than rebels deserving of the most rigorous treatment. On the other hand, the lords of the Congregation were resolved upon maintaining their position till they were furnished with substantial guarantees against the encroachments of regal power, which, in the late events, had aimed at the subversion of their liberties and the overthrow of their ancient constitution. It was obvious that the Reformers would be exposed to the vengeance of the French court, and that their own sovereign might manifest her displeasure at their conduct by prohibiting the exercise of their religion, and by severe persecution of its adherents. To provide against this danger, it was necessary to include them in the agreement between France and England, and to recognise as valid the treaty which had been formed at Berwick between Elizabeth and the leaders of the reformed party. But to this it was objected by the French commissioners that such a treaty could never be acknowledged as binding by their sovereign, without compromising her dignity in the most serious manner. "They had received no authority (they said) on this point; it was even part of their instructions that any allusion to it should be carefully avoided." Elizabeth, however, fully alive to the advantages of this treaty, had resolved upon maintaining and confirming it; and her minister, Cecil, announced his intention of breaking off the negotiations, unless her wishes were in this respect complied with. In that case, he intimated "the Duke of Norfolk should receive orders to advance with his army into Scotland, and the matter must once more be committed to the arbitrament of the sword." The sagacity of Cecil, and his acknowledged skill in diplomacy, were strikingly displayed in this protracted controversy, which ended in his obtaining all the articles he had so zealously contended for. The interests of the reformed party were successfully provided for in words that, without compromising their own sovereign, flattered the vanity of the French; while it was not made to appear that the concessions had been granted in consequence of their alliance with England. In a letter to Elizabeth, Cecil indulges in the following characteristic strain of self-congratulation:—"To make a cover for all this, these ambassadors were forced by us to take a few good words in a preface to the same article, and we consent with the kernel, yielded to them the shell to play withal."

The treaty which was thus with some difficulty concluded, was in every way advantageous to the English queen. Her minister remarks, with great truth, that it "would be no small augmentation to her honour in this beginning of her reign, that it would finally procure that conquest of Scotland which none of her progenitors, with all their battles, ever obtained—namely, the whole hearts and good-will of the nobility and people, which surely was better for England than the revenue of the crown."†

In one of the most important articles of this treaty, the right of Elizabeth to the English crown was acknowledged in the strongest terms. It was provided that Francis and Mary should renounce the claims they had advanced, and neither assume the title, nor bear the arms, of king and queen of England, in any time to come. Honourable conditions were obtained for the leaders of the Congregation and the adherents of the Reformed faith. Instructed as Randon and Montre had been carefully to avoid reference to the treaty of Berwick, and to exclude the Protestants from participating in the benefits of the proposed negotiations, they nevertheless agreed to a clause which virtually afforded them protection, and sanctioned their connection with Elizabeth. An act of indemnity, it was further decided, should be passed by all wrongs or injuries committed from the 6th of March, 1556, to the 1st of August, 1560. Catholics and Protestants were to lay aside their animosity, and a general reconciliation was to take place among the barons and subjects of the land. The nobility were ordered to disband their forces, and interdicted from again assembling them, except in such cases as were provided for by established usage. Those of their number who, like the Duke of Chatelherault, had been in France, were to be restored to their possessions. Compensation was to be given to the bishops and other churchmen who had sustained injury in the late contests, and none of them were for the future to be molested in the collection of their revenues. On the other hand, the fortifications of Leith were to be immediately demolished, the Frenchmen to evacuate the kingdom, and no foreign troops hereafter to be introduced without the knowledge and consent of parliament. It was also agreed that the affairs of state should be administered by native rulers; that no strangers should dispense justice or be advanced to places of dignity and trust, such as the high offices of Chancellor, Treasurer, and Comptroller. To secure an efficient government of the realm, during the absence of the sovereign, the conduct of public matters was to be vested in a council of twelve to be chosen out of twenty-four named by the Estates—seven to be appointed by the queen and five by the parliament. War was never to be declared, nor peace concluded, by the queen, without the concurrence of the Estates. None of the subjects of the realm, under pretence of being punished for any violation of the royal authority during the last two years, were to be deprived of the offices, benefices, or estates which they now held. It was lastly agreed that, for the settlement of religious controversies, a parliament should be convened in the month of August, for which a commission was to be sent by the king and queen of France, "and it was added, that this meeting of the Estates should in all respects be as lawful as if the same had been convoked by command of these royal persons, provided only that all who ought to be present resorted without fear to the parliament, and that its proceedings were free and unfettered."*

It will be observed that in this treaty no provisions were included favourable to the establishment in Scotland of the reformed religion. Its adherents were, indeed, protected, but their peculiar opinions received no countenance. Nor was there anything surprising in this omission. We have before alluded to the coldness with which Elizabeth regarded the cause of Protestantism, and her indifference, if not aversion, to many of the religious views of the Congregation in Scotland. It may, without injustice, be questioned whether she felt any great anxiety as to the universal diffusion and ultimate triumph of these views. It is more than probable that, in supporting the Protestants with her army, she was solely influenced by the desire of aiding them in their struggles for independence, in their natural endeavours to expel the foreign troops, and in their determination to preserve their country from the ascendancy of French councils. Nor was her conduct on this occasion wholly disinterested. The pretensions of Mary had been a source of infinite annoyance from the very commencement of her reign; she was aware of the ambitious projects of the house of Guise; she dreaded the consequences which might follow the extension of their influence to Scotland, as through that kingdom her own dominions might be invaded, her power shaken, and her throne endangered. These apprehensions furnish us with an intelligible and adequate explanation of the proceedings of Elizabeth at the important crisis, the events of which have now been recorded. And as by this treaty she had not only gained her object, but secured other and considerable advantages, she had no motive for interesting herself in the religious views of the Congregation, much less for making the recognition of their opinions a fundamental article of the conditions of the peace. She was satisfied with attempting to provide that their persons should be protected and their property secured. But while it may, perhaps, appear that the interests of the Reformers had been designedly overlooked by this treaty, in reality they had been greatly forwarded. The sovereign authority was virtually transferred to their hands. They were empowered to assemble a parliament for the discussion and settlement of religious controversies, in order to the sanctioning of which a commission was to be sent over by the queen, whereby its proceedings would be rendered as regular and valid as if it had been summoned by her own command. Such concessions were in harmony with their utmost wishes, and amply rewarded them for their courage and perseverance in the conduct of an enterprise which, at one period, had promised very different results.

While the French and English commissioners were engaged in arranging the articles of treaty, the leaders of the Congregation had presented certain propositions on the subject of religion which they desired should be considered, and either received or rejected. On the refusal of the commissioners to pronounce or even to debate upon them, they were at once withdrawn, without remonstrance, and without any expression of disappointment. Nor was this unusual acquiescence the result of indifference or fear. It is rather to be explained by the confidence of the Protestants in the truth of their principles, and in their speedy recognition on the part of the country. They felt assured that the cities, burghs, and middle classes constituting the great body of the people, were favourable to the Reformation; and that, aided by the support of the great majority of the nobles, on which they reckoned, it would soon be firmly established in Scotland. They looked forward without anxiety to the meeting of parliament, satisfied that measures would then be taken to vindicate their principles and to put an end to the controversies which distracted the nation.

The treaty having thus been concluded, peace was proclaimed at Edinburgh on the 8th July, 1560. Shortly afterwards the French forces, to the number of four thousand men, embarked in English ships for their native country. At the same time the army of Elizabeth took its departure, and on its march homeward demolished the fortifications of Eyemouth, according to agreement. A solemn by the reformed party. The services on the occasion appear to have been conducted by Knox himself, who, in forcible terms, described the miseries of their country, lately groaning under a foreign yoke and an idolatrous worship. He acknowledged God's mercy in sending them, through the instrumentality of Elizabeth, an unexpected and complete deliverance; called upon all to maintain the league which had been formed with her; and prayed that the counsels of those who endeavoured to dissolve this alliance might be confounded.* Ministers were then appointed to different stations of importance throughout the kingdom. Knox continued at Edinburgh, Goodman was sent to St. Andrew's, Heriot to Aberdeen, Row to Perth, and others to Jedburgh, Dundee, Dunfermline, and Leith. Superintendents were selected for the districts of Lothian, Glasgow, Fife, Angus, and Mearns, and lastly for Argyle and the Isles.†

On the 10th of July, 1560, the parliament assembled, but was immediately adjourned, and the parliament, ^{Meeting of} ^{Parliament,} ^{1st August, 1560.} ^{the proceedings were opened with} ^{great solemnity.} Never, in the history of the country, had the Estates met at a period when the position of affairs more imperatively demanded grave and earnest deliberation. The critical character of the times, and the peculiar circumstances of the Reformed party, occasioned the attendance at this parliament to be more than usually numerous. The Estates, who conferred together and settled the affairs of the nation, were generally composed of bishops, abbots, barons, and a few commissioners of burghs. The lesser barons, though entitled to a seat and vote in parliament, seldom exercised their rights. In ordinary times the administration of the government was, without jealousy or distrust, committed to the monarch and the nobles. The expense of repairing to the national convention, with a numerous train of vassals and dependents; "the inattention of the age to any legal or regular system of government; the exorbitant authority of the greater barons, who had drawn the whole power into their own hands, rendered the privilege of attending of so little value, as to be almost totally neglected." It was only in extraordinary conjunctures, when men were roused by a long series of oppressions to vindicate their liberty and assert their independence, when the encroachments of the crown became so intolerable as to necessitate a struggle for the maintenance of their rights and privileges, that the lesser barons combined together, and in full force mustered in parliament for the purpose of resisting the aggression of the government. Such a period had now arrived. Everywhere the people manifested a surprising enthusiasm for civil and religious liberty. They had seen their country occupied by the forces of France, and the ascendancy of French councils had threatened them with the imposition of a foreign rule; they had been forbidden the exercise of that religion which they esteemed truth, in opposition to recognised and tolerated error, and in defence of which they were prepared to lay down their lives. They had boldly and successfully contended for the Reformed faith, and they could not remain indifferent to the meeting of a parliament whose proceedings would result in momentous issues to the cause which they had so much at heart. On this account it was that, according to Lethington, the attendance at the national council was more numerous than had ever been witnessed in his own time. "Men flocked in from all corners of the kingdom, eager and determined to aid with their voices in the senate the same cause which they had defended with their swords in the field."* At this convention there appeared, in addition to the peers temporal and spiritual, the representatives of almost all the burghs, and upwards of a hundred barons, who, although of the lesser order, were gentlemen of the first rank and fortune in the nation.†

The business of the parliament would immediately have commenced, had not a preliminary objection been taken to the competency of its proceedings. We have already remarked, that so it had been summoned by authority of the nobles, and without permission from the sovereign, it was necessary to obtain her consent in the form of a commission, legalising their meeting, and sanctioning their deliberations. During the adjournment of the Estates, from the 10th of July to the 1st of August, it was provided, "that the lords deputies shall order a despatch to the king and queen, to advertise them of their having concurred to the sitting of a parliament, and to supplicate their majesties most humbly, that they would be pleased to agree to that which they have heretofore recorded."‡ That these deputies executed their mission with all due dispatch we can have no doubt; but it does not appear that any satisfactory answer was returned on the part of Mary. In these circumstances it was doubted whether they were warranted in holding a parliament. The question was very keenly agitated, and the debate lasted for a week. "In the beginning of the parliament," says Spottiswood, "there was great altercation; divers holding that no parliament could be kept, seeing that the sovereigns had sent no commission, nor authorised any to represent their persons; others, alleging that articles of the peace, whereby it was agreed that a parliament should be kept in the month of August, and that the same should be as lawful in all respects as if it were ordained by the express commands of their majesties, maintained that the said articles were warrant sufficient for their present meeting, and this opinion by voices prevailed."§

This question having been decided by the vote of the majority, the crown, the mace, and the sword, were laid upon the throne newly occupied by the sovereign, and the proceedings were opened by the election of Maitland to the office of speaker, as he was then termed, 'harangue maker.' Addressing the assembly in a short but effective speech, he sketched briefly the history of the late events, adverting to the necessity which had been laid upon them of taking up arms in defence of their liberties; the support which had been liberally extended to them, and in what way they were bound to acknowledge and repay it. He protested that no other designs had been entertained on the part of the Congregation, but such as were intended to promote the independence of their country and the toleration of their religion. He exhorted the Estates to the adoption of disinterested measures, which, leaving out of view individual interests and feelings, should have for their object the true service of God, and the advantage and happiness of the kingdom, which had fallen into so miserable a condition from the absence of good government, and the defective administration of justice. He enjoined them to live in union, to form hearty and mutual friendships, and to act as members of one body, enforcing his remarks by the illustration of the fable which represents "the mouth as having quarrelled with the members, and refusing to receive sustenance for so long a time that the whole body perished." Lastly, he prayed that amity and peace with all princes, and especially between the realms of England and Scotland, might be long maintained in the love and fear of God.*

The articles of the peace having been read over.

Proceedings of they were unanimously approved the Parliament. of, and ordered to be sent over to France, for the ratification of the sovereign. The parliament next proceeded to the election of the lords of the Articles, the order of which, says Randolph, is, that "the Lords Spiritual choose the Temporal, and the Temporal the Spiritual, and the Burgesses their own." † These lords of the Articles were a sort of committee of the Estates, whose consent was necessary before any articles or bills could be submitted to the parliament. "I observe," says Keith, "that for three hundred years backward, they have consisted of an uncertain number of members, not under three of the clergy, three of the barons, and three of the burgesses. But sometimes there have been sixteen prelates, and as many barons, though the burgesses have not been commonly so numerous, by reason, I suppose, that there was seldom any large number of those members out of which to make an election." As it was usual then for the nobility to appoint a certain number of the clergy to act in this capacity, they exercised their right by selecting those only who were well known to be favourably affected to the reformed religion, thereby giving great offence to a number of the prelates, who were altogether overlooked. "This being done," says Randolph in a letter to Cecil, wherein he describes the proceedings of the parliament, "the lords departed, and accompanied the Duke as far as the Bow, which is the gate going out of the High-street, and many down unto the palace where he lieth; the town all in armour, the trumpets sounding, and all other kinds of music, such as they have. Other solemnities have not been used, saving in times long past, the lords have had parliament robes, which are now with them wholly out of use. The lords of the Articles sat from thenceforth in Holyrood House, except that at such times as, upon any matter of importance, the whole lords assembled themselves again, as they did this day, in the Parliament House."*

The lords of the Articles having met and deliberated, they first proceeded to ratify the conditions of the late treaty. The act of indemnity, and the nomination of twenty-four persons, out of whom the council to be entrusted with supreme authority was to be chosen, were immediately agreed to. As soon as this matter was settled, a petition was presented to the parliament on the part of the Reformers, having for its object the following important results:—

1. That the doctrines of transubstantiation, justification by works, indulgence, purgatory, pilgrimage, and invocation of saints should be abolished, by authority of parliament.
2. That the profanation of the Holy Sacraments be prevented, and the discipline of the ancient church restored.
3. That the Pope's usurped authority may be abolished, and the patrimony of the church be employed to the sustentation of the ministry, the provision of schools, and the support of the poor. † This was a bold and decided step. A blow was thus aimed at the whole fabric of Popish superstition, at a period when the party of the Protestants was powerful and well organised, and the circumstances in which they were placed favoured their designs, and justified their hopes as to the final triumph of their cause. Many of the prelates were members of the national convention; but taken by surprise, and conscious of their own weakness, they offered little or no resistance to the adoption of these vigorous measures. In this passive acquiescence they were perhaps confirmed by the expectation that by yielding to the torrent of religious zeal, which was now in its full strength, it would soon be exhausted, and that the king and queen, having their attention directed to the subversion of the ancient religion, would interpose their authority, check the progress of the Reformation, and restore the church to its rightful position and its former influence. Doubtless, also, some of them were willing to sacrifice their principles, in order to secure the safety of their persons and the undisturbed possession of their revenues.

Actuated by such motives as these, when the Confession of Faith, or summary of the Protestant doctrines, was laid before parliament, the prelates, aware that an overwhelming majority was arrayed against them, felt that all opposition would be useless, and declined to state their opinions. There was, consequently, no discussion, and the consent of parliament to this important document was given almost by acclamation, some of the lords declaring in their enthusiasm that they would sooner end their lives than think contrary to these doctrines.

The Primate, with the Bishops of Dunkeld and Dunblane, contented themselves with protesting against its adoption, on the ground that time had not been afforded for the examination of its contents. In this protest they were joined by the Earls of Cassillis and Caithness, and, as Spottiswood mentions, by the Earl of Atholl, and Lords Somerville and Borthwick. But, in spite of their objections, the Confession was adopted by the Estates on the 17th of August, 1560, and declared to be the standard of the Protestant faith in Scotland.

In order to give effect to this resolution of the parliament, three other acts were immediately passed. The first declared that the former clergy were nothing else but usurped ministers; that the new preachers were the only persons that had power to administer the sacraments; "that the sayers and hearers of mass should, for the first fault, suffer the confiscation of all their goods whatsoever, movable and immovable, and a corporal discretionary punishment besides; for the second fault, banishment out of the kingdom; and for the third, loss of life—three punishments," quaintly adds the historian, "well enough calculated for compelling men to come in!"* The second act abolished for ever the authority of the Pope in the realm of Scotland; and the third repealed all former statutes passed in favour of the Roman Catholic Church, or known to be in spirit and tendency opposed to the Confession of Faith now ratified and approved by the Estates.

It has been justly remarked, in reference to the enactment which instituted penalties for the purpose of securing conformity in religious opinion, that "Few blessings have been of slower growth in Europe than religious toleration. The same men who had groaned so lately under persecution, and who upbraided their brethren, and with perfect justice, for the tyranny of maintaining their errors with fire and sword, now injured the cause they advocated by similar severities, and compelled the reception of what they pronounced as truth, under the penalty of death."†

Various other measures of a similar character were passed by this parliament against the Roman Catholic bishops. Many of these prelates considering the meeting to be illegal, for reasons which have been already alluded to, had absented themselves, and on this account had given great offence to the Reformed party. Others, having taken their seats, declined to take part in the proceedings, on the ground that when the lords of the Articles were chosen they were unjustly overlooked. For these and other reasons a bill of complaint was presented against them on the part of the barons, containing, according to Randolph's account, "rather a general accusation of all living bishops than any special crime that they were burdened with." Summonses were issued to the Bishops of Dunblane, St. Andrew's, and Dunkeld, who were called upon to appear and answer the complaint. But as they declined to comply, judgment was passed in their absence, and a decree issued ordaining the 'stay of their livings.' But matters did not rest here. Aware that their possessions were endangered, and anxious to secure them from falling into the hands of the barons, many of the prelates had adopted the expedient of granting conveyances or leases of their lands to those who agreed to rent them in the meantime, and to re-convey them to their original proprietors when times should become more auspicious. Such a proceeding, it is obvious, was not likely to receive the sanction of the Estates, although it was approved of by the Pope; and, characterising it as an unjustifiable alienation of the estates of the church, which deserved to be severely censured, the parliament passed a resolution directing that all such leases should be void, without further process of law.

The next subject of importance which was brought before the Estates was the Confirmation of the treaty which had been entered into between the lords of the Congregation and the English queen. On this point the greatest unanimity prevailed, and without any discussion this important treaty was at once confirmed. The advantages of a lasting peace between the two realms was, indeed, so apparent to all, that a proposal having been made to place so desirable a peace on a secure footing, by the marriage of Elizabeth with the Earl of Arran, eldest son of the Duke of Chatelherault, and heir-apparent to the Scottish throne, it was received with the greatest favour, and even enthusiasm, and immediate steps were taken for its realisation. It was resolved "that suit should be made to the Queen of England, in the best manner, that it may please her majesty, for the establishing of a perpetual friendship, to join in marriage with the Earl of Arran."*

The parliament was subsequently occupied with the selection of the twenty-four members out of whom the Council of Twelve was to be chosen. The election issued in the appointment of the following noblemen and barons, among whom were included not only the principal leaders of the Congregation, but several influential members of the opposite party. The Duke, the Earls of Arran, Huntly, Argyll, Glencairn, Morton, Atholl, Monteith, Marischal, and Rothes; the Lords James, Eskine, Ruthven, Lindsay, Boyd, Ogilvy, St. John, and the Master of Maxwell; the Lairds of Lundy, Pitarrow, Dun, Drumlanrig, Cunninghamhead, and Lethington. As it was necessary that six of the twelve should be appointed by the sovereign, it was resolved that, till the arrival of a commission from France which should determine this, six of the former should sit continually at Edinburgh, for the administration of justice. If, however, any measure of importance, involving the general interests of the kingdom should be brought before them, no fewer than sixteen of the above number were ordered to attend.†

The last act of the parliament, previous to its dissolution, on the 27th of August, was to authorise Sir James Sandilands, of Calder, Grand Prior of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem within Scotland, to proceed to France, and inform their majesties of the matters which had been arranged at the meetings of the national council. Lethington, with the Earls of Morton and Glencairn, was dispatched with the same commission to the court of England. This resolution, so far, at least, as it respected France, was in accordance with the agreement which had been entered into between the deputies of the king and queen, and the leaders of the Congregation, which provided "That the nobility of Scotland have engaged that, in the ensuing convention of estates, some persons of quality shall be chosen for to repair to their majesties, and lay before them the state of their affairs, at which time they shall get delivered to them a ratification done by their majesties."* It was not to be expected that the reception of Sandilands would be favourable. The proceedings of the Congregation had certainly been irregular. Parliament had assembled on its own authority, and without waiting

His reception. either for the sovereigns' ratification of the treaty, or the commission which should invest their meetings with a legal sanction. Resolutions had been taken, and measures passed, of vast importance, and calculated to effect a more momentous change in the constitution of the kingdom than any series of acts which had ever been introduced in the preceding history of the nation. These, to a great extent, must have been highly obnoxious to the queen, and still more so to the house of Guise, her most influential advisers. It was not to be anticipated that her consent would ever be accorded to the sweeping innovations which had overturned the established religion, and confirmed in its place a faith she had been taught from her youth to regard with suspicion and dislike. Nor could the evident influence of Elizabeth in the Scottish parliament fail to awaken resentment in the court of France. All their efforts had hitherto been directed to break off the good understanding which subsisted between the two countries, and the failure of these, together with the recent confirmation of the alliance with England, must have been extremely mortifying.

The feelings of the queen's advisers on this subjectment of the ject were strongly expressed in an French court. interview which took place between the English ambassador, Throckmorton, and the Cardinal Lorraine, soon after the arrival of Sandilands, who had been but coldly received. "I tell you frankly," said this proud minister, "the Scots, the king's subjects, do perform no part of their duties; the king and the queen have the name of their sovereigns, and your mistress hath the effect and the obedience. They would bring the realm to a republic, and say in their words they are the king's subjects. To tell you of the particular disorders were too long; every man doth what he lists. All this is too far out of order; and when fault is found with them, they threaten the king with the aid of the queen, your mistress. Let your mistress either make them obedient subjects, or let her rid her hands of them; for, rather than they shall be at this point, the king will quit all. They have made a league with the queen, your mistress, without us; what manner of dealing is this of subjects? Thereupon it is they bear themselves so proudly. They have sent hither a mean man, in post to the king and queen, their sovereigns; and to the queen, your mistress, a great and solemn legation. This great legation goeth for the marriage of the queen, your mistress, with the Earl of Arran. What shall she have with him? I think her heart too great to marry with such an one as he is, and one of the queen's subjects."* This language gives us a good idea of the light in which the conduct of the Reformers was regarded by the court of France.

The queen having for some time delayed giving an answer to the ambassador, who had requested from her a ratification of the treaty and of the proceedings of the late parliament, at length intimated her refusal. And it is to be observed, says Keith, that "neither now, nor at any time thereafter, even when she was returned into her ancient and hereditary kingdom of Scotland, and thereby free from the influence of her husband and French relations, could her majesty be prevailed upon to own and acknowledge the late meeting as a lawful parliament; nor were the acts therein passed ever allowed to be printed and published along with the acts of other parliaments, during her majesty's administration."†

At this time an interview took place between the Scottish sovereign and the English ambassador, which is interesting, not only on account of the insight it affords us into the real sentiments of Mary, but as giving us an opportunity of observing her behaviour in this, her first public appearance. She was then only sixteen; and "it must be admitted that in this conversation, with one of the ablest ministers of Elizabeth, she acquitted herself with uncommon spirit and good sense." Throckmorton having entreated her to ratify the treaty she replied:—"Such answer as the king, my lord and husband, and his council, hath made you in that matter, might suffice: but because you shall know I have reason to do as I do, I will tell you what moveth me to refuse to ratify the treaty. My subjects in Scotland do their duty in nothing, nor have they performed one point that belongeth unto them. I am their queen, and so they call me; but they use me not so. They have done what pleaseth them; and although I have not many faithful subjects there, yet those few that be there on my party, were not present when these matters were done, nor at this assembly. I will have them assemble by my authority, and proceed in their doings after the laws of the realm, which they so much boast of, and keep none of them. They have sent hither a poor gentleman to me, whom I disdain to have come in the name of them all to the king and me in such a legation. They have sent great personages to your mistress: I am their sovereign, but they take me not so. They must be taught to know their duties." "In this speech," says Throckmorton, "the queen uttered some choleric and stomach against them. I said, 'as to the Lord of St. John, I know him not; but he is Great Prior of Scotland, and you know by others what rank that estate hath, equal to any earl within your realm.' The queen answered, 'I do not take him for Great Prior, for he is married. I marvel how it happeneth they could send other manner of men to your mistress.' I said, 'madam, I have heard that if your majesty do proceed graciously with the Lord St. John, in observation of all that which was by the Bishop of Valence and Mons. de Randan promised in the king's and your name, the nobles and states of Scotland do mind to send unto the king and you a greater legation.' 'Then the king and I,' quoth she, 'must begin with them.' 'Madam,' quoth I, 'I am sorry the ratification of the treaty is refused; for that matter, together with other injuries offered to the queen, my mistress (as, contrary to the express articles of the treaty, the king and you do bear openly the arms of England), will give the queen, my mistress, occasion greatly to suspect your well-meaning unto her.' 'Mine uncles,' quoth she, 'have sufficiently answered you in this matter. And for your part, I pray you, do the office of a good minister betwixt us, and so shall you do well.' And so, he concludes, the queen dismissed me, and Mons. de Lansac brought me to my horse."*

Successive historians have fallen into a mistake in regard to the reception of Sir James Sandilands. They have taken their account from Buchanan, who states, that when the Great Prior was received by the Guises, "they reproved him with great harshness, because that he, a man devoted to a holy military order, should have undertaken to carry the messages of rebels, in favour of an execrable heresy, which, with the universal approbation of all nations, had been condemned by the Council of Trent." On the other hand, it is stated by the English ambassador, Throckmorton, who was, as we have seen, at court, and probably in daily communication with him, that "the Lord St. John had his dépeche here the 21st of this month. He took not his leave of the king, by reason of his indisposition, but of the queen, and the Cardinal Lorraine. He had very good words, and was required to use the part and office of a good minister towards the Estates of Scotland, and of a good subject towards his sovereigns. He hath a letter from the king and queen to the said Estates, the copy whereof I send your majesty herewith."†

Previous to his departure, St. John had a private interview with the envoy of Elizabeth, in which he entreated him to recommend to the English queen, 'the ordering of their affairs in Scotland,' as without her aid and interference it was probable the affairs of the Congregation would soon be in as unfortunate a condition as they had been before.

In the meantime the ambassadors of the parliament proceeded to England, and were cordially received by Elizabeth. ^{Results of the embassy to England.} Professing their gratitude for the seasonable and effectual assistance which she had afforded them, they besought her to render the friendship between the two nations perpetual, by condescending to a union with the Earl of Arran, who, though a subject, was nearly allied to the royal family of Scotland, and was indeed the heir-apparent to the throne. To this proposal an answer was returned, acknowledging the "great goodwill of the Estates towards her majesty, offering her the best and choicest person that they have, and that not without some danger of the displeasure of the French King in so doing; but that her majesty finding herself not disposed presently to marry, although it may be that the necessity and respect of her realm shall hereafter constrain her, wished that the Earl of Arran should not forbear to accept such marriage as may be made to him, for his own weal and surety; and that all other means be used to the continuance of amity firmly betwixt these kingdoms, whereunto her majesty thinketh many good reasons ought to induce the people of both realms, and in a manner to continue as good amity thereby as by marriage."*

It is interesting to observe the policy of the Guises at this period. Their object, now, as formerly, was to effect a separation between the Reformers and Elizabeth, to isolate them from the courts both of France and England—that when thus left to their own resources, and made sensible of their own weakness, they might be forced to purchase peace, however unfavourable the terms, and however great the sacrifice.

The important end to which all their schemes were directed, was the arresting of the progress of the Reformation, and the re-estab- ^{Policy of the Guises.} lishment throughout Europe of the ancient faith. "To put down the Huguenots in France, to encourage the Romanists in England and Scotland, to sow dissensions amongst the Protestant princes in Germany, to support the Council of Trent now sitting, and, in a word, to concentrate the whole strength of France, Spain, Italy, and the Empire, against that great moral and religious revolution, by which light and truth were struggling to free themselves from the trammels of many long-established errors, was the chief object to which they bent their efforts." The steps they should take, in order to the accomplishment of these designs depended on the issue of the embassy now dispatched on the part of the parliament, to negotiate a marriage between Elizabeth and the Earl of Arran. If, as seemed probable, she should refuse to comply with their wishes, they resolved to persuade the Scots that she had acted solely from a desire to aggrandize herself, and that now their eyes were opened to the insidious character of her designs, it would be prudent to break off their engagements with her, and form with France such a close alliance, as would effectually protect them from the consequences of her displeasure. They proposed also to bribe Arran into the relinquishment of his connection with the Congregation, by offering to marry him to a daughter of France, to invest him with the office of Lieutenant in Scotland, where, acting for the king and queen, his powers would be almost unlimited, and the whole revenue of the kingdom would be at his disposal. Further, they determined to weaken the power of the Congregation, by sowing dissensions among their leaders. These schemes, it appears, however secretly concocted, were not unknown to Throckmorton, who, in order to counteract them, advised Elizabeth to employ one of his subtle and intriguing agents, named Clark, an archer of the French guard, who was accordingly dispatched to Scotland, to act as a spy upon the conduct of the Guisian faction.*

Certain state papers which have been recently brought to light place in a very striking aspect the unscrupulous policy of the house of Guise at this period. We have seen that, under the regency of the queen-dowager, the affairs of Scotland were entrusted to the management of a Frenchman, named D'Osell. This officer, however, on the return to the court, of Monluc, Bishop of Valence, found himself deprived of all influence, and subjected to the displeasure of his royal master. The cause of his disgrace is stated by Throckmorton. It appears that, during the late war, advice had been tendered to the queen-regent, by the Bishop of Amiens, De la Brosse, and Martignes, to the effect that, dissembling with the Congregation, she should summon a parliament at Leith or Edinburgh, and having thus got them into her power, should seize, and summarily put to death, the leaders of the Reformed party. Through the influence of D'Osell, his associates were compelled reluctantly to abandon their nefarious proposal. On this account, the want of success which attended the French cause was imputed to his conduct, and henceforth he not only ceased to be consulted regarding the affairs of Scotland, but was treated on all occasions with studied coldness and neglect.†

At this crisis an event took place which considerably modified the condition of affairs, and was productive of important consequences to Scotland. This was the death of the French monarch, Francis II., who expired at Orleans, on the 6th of December, 1560. By the demise of her husband, the youthful queen was placed in a position peculiarly trying. Inexperienced as she was, however, she exhibited an energy and self-possession, which proved that she was not unequal to the duties and responsibilities which had thus so unexpectedly devolved upon her. In a letter addressed by Throckmorton at this period to the English council, we are presented with an interesting view, not only of the character of Mary, but of the position of parties, and the projected policy of England:—

“My very good lords—Now that God hath thus disposed of the late French king, whereby the Scottish queen is left a widow, in my simple judgment, one of the special things your lordships have to consider, and to have an eye to, is the marriage of that queen. During her husband's life there was no great account made of her; for that, being under band of marriage and subjection of her husband, who carried the burden and care of all her matters, there was offered no great occasion to know what was in her. But since her husband's death she hath showed, and so continueth, that she is both of great wisdom for her years, modesty, and also of great judgment in the wise handling herself and her matters; which, increasing in her with her years, cannot but turn to her commendation, reputation, honour, and great benefit of her and her country. And already it appeareth, that some such as made no great account of her, do now, seeing her wisdom, both honour and pity her.

“Immediately upon her husband's death, she changed her lodging, withdrew herself from all company, became so solitary and exempt from all worldliness, that she doth not to this day see daylight, and thus will continue out forty days. For the space of fifteen days after the death of her said husband, she admitted no man to come unto her chamber, but the king, his brethren, the King of Navarre, the constable, and her uncles. About four or five days after that, she was content to admit some bishops, and the ancient knights of the order, and none of the younger, saving Martignes, who, having done her good service, and married the chief gentlewoman of her chamber, had so much favour showed him among the rest. The ambassadors also were lastly admitted, as they came, who have been all with her to condole, saving I, which I have forborne to do, knowing not the queen's majesty's pleasure in that behalf.

“Amongst others, the ambassador of Spain hath been with her above an hour together, which is thought to be far more than the ceremony of condoling required. He hath also since that time dined, and had great conference with the Cardinal of Lorraine; and though I cannot yet think that it be about any matter of marriage for her with the Prince of Spain—for I think the Council of Spain too wise to think upon it without other commodity—yet it is not amiss to hearken to the matter; for she, using herself as she beginneth, will make herself to be beloved, and to lack no good means of offers. But to conclude herein: as long as the matter shall be well handled in England, and that now, in time, good occasions be not let pass, the King of Spain will have little mind that way. As for my part, I see her behaviour to be such, and her wisdom and queenly modesty so great, in that she thinketh herself not too wise, but is content to be ruled by good counsel and wise men (which is a great virtue in a prince or princess, and which argueth a great judgment and wisdom in her) that by these means she cannot do amiss. And I cannot but fear her proceedings with the time, if any means be left, and offered her to take advantage by.

“I understand very credibly,” continued the ambassador, “that the said Scottish queen is desirous to return into Scotland; marry, she would so handle the matter as that the desire should not seem nor appear to come of herself, nor of her seeking, but by the request and suit of the subjects of Scotland. To compass which device she hath sent one Robert Lesley (who pretendeth title to the earldom of Rothes) into Scotland, to work by such as are hers; and, besides them, doubteth nothing to procure to her a good many of those that were lately against her; and among others, she holdeth herself sure of the Lord James and of all the Stewards, wholly to be at her devotion. She mistrusteth none but the Duke of Chatelherault and his party; and besides these, she nothing doubteth to assure to her, with easy persuasions, the whole, or the most part, of those that carried themselves indifferently as neutrals all this while, who are thought to be many besides the common people. And now to have their queen home [they] will altogether, she thinketh, lean and incline to her. Upon request, thus to be made to her by these nobles, requiring to have her return, she will demand that the principal forts and holds of the realm be delivered into her hands, or to such for her as she will appoint, to the end that she may be more assured against the evil meaning of the hollow-hearted, or such as fear the worst towards themselves. She doth also look that those that shall thus request her to come into Scotland, shall offer and promise all obedience and duty belonging to loving and obedient subjects; whom she will, for her part, recompense by all the favour, assurance, and benevolence, that a prince can promise and owe to good subjects. This matter, my lords, being worth good consideration, I leave to your lordships’ grave wisdom to consider of it.”*

It is not difficult to understand the universal satisfaction with which the news of the king’s death was received in Scotland. So long as he continued to reign there was every danger that the peace of the kingdom would be again disturbed by the machinations of the house of Guise. The influence of Mary over her weak and compliant husband was unbounded, and the conduct of that princess was entirely under the direction of her uncles, the princes of Lorraine. Their hostility to the Reformed party, and their determination to take decisive measures to compass its destruction, have been already alluded to. Hitherto they had been thwarted in their designs, partly by the timely interposition of Elizabeth in behalf of the Congregation, and partly by the religious commotions which at this period distracted their native country. The latter would, probably, have soon been brought to a conclusion, and means might have been found to prevent a repetition of the former. In either case they would have been left at liberty to pursue their dark policy, and to visit Scotland with the consequences of their long-meditated vengeance. The dangers to which the kingdom was thus exposed were to a great extent averted by the death of Francis. “The princes of Lorraine were obliged to contract their views, to turn them from foreign to domestic objects, and, instead of forming vast projects with regard to Britain, found it necessary to think of acquiring and establishing an interest with the new administration.”

Shortly after the king’s death a parliament was summoned, which assembled at Meeting of Parliament, Edinburgh on the 16th of January, 1561. At this meeting Sir James Sandilands appeared, and, after giving an account of his mission, produced the letter with which his sovereign had entrusted him. This document informed the Estates that she had been assured of their determination to remain steadfast in their allegiance, but that in the account she had received of their late assembly (she refused to term it a parliament), she observed with regret that their conduct but little coincided with these professions. She was willing, she remarked, that their requests should meet with the consideration to which they were entitled, and that for this purpose she had resolved to dispatch two noble persons with authority to convene a legal parliament, where their alleged grievances would meet with a full discussion.* A good deal of consideration was given by the barons to this letter, which, however, lost much of its interest in consequence of the king’s death. The result of their deliberations was expressed in a very important resolution of the parliament—viz., that their sovereign, who was now unconnected with France by any tie of sufficient importance to detain her in that country, should be invited to return to her own dominions; and that their sentiments on this subject should be delivered to her by the Lord James, her own brother, and the principal leader of the Congregation. Explicit instructions were given to the ambassador as to the terms of his message. He was to assure the sovereign of a hearty reception from her loyal and devoted subjects, provided only that she reposed confidence in their attachment, and consented to return unaccompanied by any foreign force. She was advised to proceed through England, where she might obtain an interview with Elizabeth, and consult with her as to the maintenance of a permanent peace between the two countries. On the subject of religion he was admonished by Knox that if he consented that she should hear mass either publicly or privately, he would be considered as betraying the cause of God and exposing religion to the utmost peril. To this he replied, "That he would never consent that she should hear mass publicly; but to hear it secretly in her chamber, who could stop her?"*

The activity of the Protestants at this juncture was not lost upon the opposite party. Alive to the necessity of obtaining, and, if possible, preserving an ascendancy in the councils of the young sovereign, the Romish party secretly assembled a convention and deliberated on the measures to be adopted. This meeting was attended by the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Bishops of Aberdeen, Moray, and Ross; the Earls of Huntly, Atholl, Crawford, Sutherland, Marischal, Caithness, and a number of influential barons. It was then resolved that John Leslie, Official and Vicar-General of the diocese of Aberdeen, and afterwards Bishop Ross, should be deputed to wait upon the queen, to express their attachment to her person, and to remain at court to watch the current of events. The departure of the Lord James was delayed for a short time, in consequence of the arrival in Scotland of four commissioners from the queen. These were Preston of Craigmillar, Ogilvy of Findlater, Lumsden of Blanern, and Lesley of Auchtermuchty. They were the bearers of a commission from her majesty, directed to some of the principal nobility of the kingdom—the Duke of Chatelherault, Argyle, Atholl, Huntly, Bothwell, the Lord James, and the Archbishop of St. Andrew's—authorising them to summon a parliament, at which she intimated an ambassador from France, in the person of Monsieur de Noailles, would appear, for the purpose of proposing a renewal of their ancient league with that kingdom. The message which accompanied these instructions was conciliatory. She expressed her intention of returning speedily to her own dominions, of extending forgiveness to all political offenders, and sending out of the country the few French soldiers who still remained in garrison within the fortress of Dunbar. She also informed them that, while she had received offers of marriage from the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, and the Prince of Spain, it was not her intention to take any decided step, 'without in person consulting her nobles, and receiving the assent of her people.' † Letters were at the same time dispatched by Mary to all the leading men of the kingdom, declaring that, notwithstanding their past conduct, she was resolved to continue them in their present offices, provided only that they remained faithful in their allegiance to herself.

The policy of Elizabeth, at this juncture, was marked by her characteristic sagacity and prudence. It was obviously her interest to retain the influence she had acquired in Scotland, and at the same time to keep on friendly terms with the young sovereign, as well as to preserve amicable relations with the court of France. To secure the first, she instructed Randolph, then resident in Edinburgh, as her accredited envoy, in the particular line of conduct he was now to follow. This person was one of the ablest agents she had ever employed; but he is described as being of "a dark intriguing spirit, full of cunning and void of conscience; and there is little doubt that the unhappy divisions in Scotland were fomented, by this man's artifices, for more than twenty years." He was enjoined to hold friendly intercourse with the Protestant leaders; to assure them of the unabated determination of his mistress to adhere to the great principles of the Reformed faith; to exhort them to have no confidence in France, to avoid committing themselves to any alliance with that country, which could never be productive of good, and, finally, to ratify their engagements with England, and labour to secure permanence for the present peace.

For the purpose of gaining the second object embraced by the policy of the English queen, the Earl of Bedford was sent over to present her condolences to Mary, on occasion of her late bereavement; but he was also instructed to require from her that ratification of the treaty which had been hitherto refused. He was to remind her that the disturbances of her kingdom had terminated on the removal of the French forces; that for the last hundred years the borders had never enjoyed so much peace as at present; and that if she wished the prosperity to be lasting, it could only be perpetuated by allowing the country the same freedom as had been universally granted during the reign of her father, James V., "which consisted chiefly in its being governed by its own laws, and ruled by means of its 'natural or born' people." Bedford, in addition, was enjoined, if he discovered any disposition on the part of the house of Guise to promote the marriage of Mary with Spain or Austria, to stimulate the King of Navarre to protest against it, as contrary to his own greatness, and subversive of the interests of Christendom.*

This envoy arrived at Paris on the 3rd of February, and on the 15th proceeded to Fontainebleau, where he was received by Mary with much kindness and cordiality. His interview, and that of Throckmorton, with the Scottish queen, is very minutely described, in a letter addressed by them to the Privy Council. On being much pressed to ratify the treaty which had lately been concluded at Edinburgh, she replied that "there were more reasons to persuade to amity between Elizabeth, her good sister, and herself than between any two princes in all Christendom. We are both," said she, "in one isle, both of one language, both the nearest kinswomen that each other hath, and both queens. As to the treaty of Edinburgh, I am here, as you see, without all counsel. And I pray you to tell the queen, my good sister, I trust, ere it be long, some of the nobility and council of Scotland will be here, for I do hear they mean to send some shortly unto me. And when I shall have communed with them, mind to send my good sister, the queen, your mistress, such an answer as I trust she shall be pleased with."* Much dissatisfied with the results of this interview, Bedford returned to England.

According to the statement of Secretary Lethington, Scotland was at this time divided into three parties. The first consisted of the Duke of Chatelherault and his adherents, whose efforts were directed to bring about a marriage between Mary and his eldest son, the Earl of Arran. The second were desirous of the immediate return of the queen to her own dominions, where they were ready to secure for her a favourable reception, under the single condition that she should arrive unaccompanied by a foreign force. Many of the nobility, of the highest rank and influence, were included in this party. They believed that if she consented to their wishes she would be induced to favour their religion, and ratify the treaty with England. A third faction are described as neutrals, who, without a settled policy, were willing to support the adoption of any measures, provided they were sanctioned by the authority of the sovereign.

While Mary was residing at Rheims, she was visited, on the 14th of April, by Lesley with Mary. Lesley, the envoy of the Romish party, who then delivered to her the message with which he had been entrusted. He assured her of the warm attachment and devotion of his friends in Scotland; and warned her to put no trust in the Lord James, who was now on his way to her presence, to reject his counsels, and, above all, to detain him, if possible, in France, till after she had arrived in her own kingdom. He recommended her to land at Aberdeen, where, as the Reformed religion had made little progress in the north of Scotland, an army of twenty thousand men could easily be collected, with which she might advance with security to Edinburgh, and defeat the designs of her enemies. It does not appear that Mary was favourably impressed by this interview. She was not disposed, and with reason, to put implicit confidence in the promises even of her professed friends. Several of the nobles who had deputed Lesley—Huntly amongst the number—while avowing their adherence to the ancient faith, had, nevertheless, for the furtherance, as she believed, of their own selfish projects, joined themselves to the party of the Congregation, and powerfully aided them in carrying out their extreme measures. It is not surprising, therefore, that the mission of the Roman Catholic envoy proved a failure. Mary intimated no approval of the advice he tendered, nor any intention of taking advantage of the offer so urgently pressed on her acceptance. In giving an account of his interview, Lesley simply observes, that he was graciously received and listened to, that she commanded him to remain by her person till her return to Scotland, and in the meantime to assure the lords and prelates who had sent him of her favour towards them, and her intention to reside in her kingdom.*

It was a curious circumstance that this visit was paid on the very day previous to that on which the Lord James was admitted into her presence. This nobleman, in repairing to France, had passed through England, and solicited an interview with Elizabeth. Being pressed by that princess to obtain from Mary the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh, he assured her that, in his present visit to his sister, he was not the bearer of any public commission, and that the only message he conveyed from the council and nobility was 'a general declaration of their duty and devotion to their sovereign.' It appears that much difference of opinion prevailed on the part of Cecil and Throckmorton as to the propriety of allowing him to pass over to France. The latter observes, in one of his letters, "I learn that this king, by means of the Queen of Scotland, deviseth all the means he can to win him to his devotion, and for that purpose hath both procured for him the red hat, if he will accept it, and also mindeth to endow him with good abbeyes and benefices in this realm. If he will be won, then your majesty knoweth he may be, as it is like he will be, the most perilous man to your majesty and your realm of all the realm of Scotland, and most able to stand this king in his best stead for the matters there, so that his coming cannot but prejudice every way; and I verily believe, if he come, he will not return into Scotland so soon as he thinketh." Cecil, on the other hand, relying on his well-known disposition to cultivate and maintain friendship with England, was disposed to put implicit confidence in the Lord James; and, accordingly, after treating him with great distinction, dismissed him with many expressions of good-will.

Her brother was received by Mary with characteristic kindness. She had ever entertained an affection for him, and his frank disposition, and winning manners, were well calculated to dispose her favourably towards him. Had she been aware, however, of the character of his intercourse with the English sovereign and her ministers, her conduct on this occasion would have been very different. As it was, he soon gained a very decided influence over her, and induced her freely to disclose to him her intentions. She admitted, without hesitation, that she was by no means satisfied with the terms of intimate alliance which subsisted between Scotland and England; that, as to the treaty of Edinburgh, she was anxious that it should be broken off, and that, at all events, she would on no account ratify it without the advice and consent of her own parliament. She also intimated her intention to prohibit the meeting of the Estates till such time as she herself could meet with them, and attend their deliberations. From his conversation with the queen, Lord James soon learnt that, while she would never consent to a union with the Earl of Arran, she was not averse to a marriage with a foreign prince. As to the manner of her return to her kingdom, she intimated her intention, instead of passing through England, to proceed by sea. Having made these explanations, she endeavoured to persuade Lord James to renounce the Protestant faith and return to the creed of Rome. In these endeavours she was strongly seconded by the Guises, who, among other inducements, held out the offer of a Cardinal's hat, and the highest advancement in the church; but, resisting every importunity, he remained true to his engagements with the Reformed party. This firmness of purpose raised rather than lowered him in the estimation of the queen, and confirmed the resolution she had already formed of entrusting to him the management of public affairs till her own arrival in her kingdom. As he proposed an immediate return to Scotland, she intimated that his commission for this purpose would be sent after him.

It must be admitted that the conduct of the Lord James at this time was marked both by ingratitude and duplicity. No sooner had he left his sovereign, who had now honoured him with such signal proofs of her esteem and confidence, than, proceeding to Paris, he held a secret interview with the English ambassador, Throckmorton, and disclosed to him everything that had passed between himself and Mary. This information was, of course, immediately transmitted to Elizabeth, with the remark that, on his return through England, Lord James would communicate the circumstances in greater detail to her Majesty.*

The history of this period is extremely intricate, and it is impossible to trace with accuracy the underhand and unprincipled transactions which then undoubtedly took place. This much is certain, that the policy of Elizabeth was dark and crooked; the measures of her ministers base; and the conduct of many of the Scottish nobles highly venal. The letter of Throckmorton to the queen, to which we have just referred, furnishes, we think, satisfactory confirmation of the statement now made. It discloses the nature of the advice tendered by her ministers to the English sovereign, and intimates the possible corruption of influential persons in Scotland, who might thereby be bribed to favour her designs. "At this present," says he, "your majesty hath peace with all the world, and I see no occasion to move unto your majesty or your realm any war from any place or person, but by the Queen of Scotland and her means. Then wisdom doth advise your majesty to buy your surety, quietness, and felicity, though it cost you dear. Tho means to assure this is, in time, before any other push in his feet, his hire, and practices, to win unto your majesty's devotion and party the mightiest, the wisest, and the most honest of the realm of Scotland. And, though it be to your majesty great charge, as twenty thousand pounds yearly, yet it is in no wise to be omitted or spared. And in sorting your entertainment to every person, there should be some special consideration had of the Earl of Arran, because he is the second person of that realm, whose quality and credit your majesty knoweth better than I; and in like manner of the Lord James, whose credit, love, and honesty is comparable, in my judgment, to any man of that realm."

The visit of the Lord James to Paris was much resented by Mary. She had earnestly entreated him not to visit the French court or to return home through England; and, when her reasonable wishes in these respects were not regarded, her sentiments towards him were much modified. She changed her resolution of entrusting him with supreme authority, and dismissed the gentleman who had remained behind to receive from her hands the commission which appointed him Governor. This circumstance was taken advantage of by Throckmorton, who advised his sovereign that Mary's sentiments had been altered solely on account of the devotion she had discovered in the Lord James towards the English queen, "and on this account he deserveth to be well entertained and made of, as one that may stand you in no small need for the advancement of your desire." What were the precise objects which the ambition of the Lord James urged him at this period to compass cannot now be ascertained. Whatever might be the nature of these, certain it is that he courted the favour of Elizabeth in an extraordinary degree, and in so doing, acted, to say the least of it, an unfaithful and disingenuous part. We are not disposed, however, to put implicit confidence in all that has been stated as to his conduct during his residence at the English court. It is well enough known that, if all other schemes concocted for the purpose of detaining Mary in France failed, means were to be taken to intercept her on her passage; but it is difficult to imagine that her brother could prove so far forgetful of his duty to his country and his queen, or so ungrateful to a sister who had loaded him with kindness, as to become a party to so mean and despicable a measure.

In the month of March the court of France dispatched Monsieur Noailles with a commission, which empowered him to require—1. That the ancient league betwixt the two kingdoms should be renewed. 2. That the late confederacy with England should be dissolved. 3. That the churchmen should be restored to their places and benefices. It was not to be expected that such demands would be complied with; but the consideration of them was delayed till the meeting of the convention, which was appointed to take place in the month of May. Accordingly, at this period, the nobility having assembled, the French ambassador brought forward his propositions. They were at once rejected, and strong resolutions drawn up expressive of their determination to maintain their alliance with England. It was observed in the answers which were furnished to Noailles, that

An ambassador from France arrives in Scotland.

France had not deserved that either they or their posterity should again enter into any league or confederacy with that country, seeing that the French had traitorously and cruelly persecuted them, under pretence of unity and marriage. That they could not righteously dissolve a league which had been formed in the name of God with that sovereign who had delivered Scotland from the tyranny of the Guises. And lastly, "That such as they called bishops and churchmen, they knew neither for pastors of the church, nor yet for any just possessors of the patrimony thereof, but understood them perfectly to be wolves, thieves, murderers, and idle bellies. And, therefore, as Scotland hath forsaken their Pope and Papistry, so they could not be debtors to his foresworn vassals."*

On these replies being transmitted to France, Elizabeth again endeavoured to procure from Mary the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh. For this purpose, Throckmorton solicited and obtained an interview with Mary. He found, however, her resolution on this subject unshaken. She expressed herself desirous of preserving friendly relations with Elizabeth, but determined to take no steps in the matter alluded to till she had first an opportunity of consulting her parliament. It was urged in reply that there appeared no necessity for this, seeing that the treaty in question had been entered into with their knowledge and by their express desire. "Yea," she answered, "by some of them, but not by all. It will appear when I come amongst them whether they be of the same mind that you say they were then of. But of this I assure you, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, I, for my part, am very desirous to have the perfect and assured amity of the queen, my good sister, and I will use all the means I can to give her occasion to think that I mean it indeed."†

Let us here consider for a moment the motives which, on the one hand, constrained Elizabeth to insist on the ratification of this treaty, and, on the other, weighed with Mary in persisting with her refusal. Many of its articles, it is true, were extremely favourable to the interests of Elizabeth, but were such, also, as could not possibly be objected to by the Queen of Scots, with any show of reason. In almost every instance these articles had been carried into effect by both parties. The fortifications of Leith had been demolished, and the respective forces of England and France withdrawn at the appointed time. It was the sixth article which excited the resentment of Mary, and moved her to withstand all attempts to induce her to comply with its terms. Its stipulations were originally drawn up at the suggestion, or rather the demand, of Cecil, who had declared his determination, rather than give them up, to break off negotiations altogether. Offensive at the time to the French ambassadors, they could not be less so to their royal mistress. She was required, in accordance with them, to acknowledge the sole right of Elizabeth to the crowns of England and Ireland; to renounce, in express language, her own claims to the same; and to engage for the future to abstain from using the titles or bearing the arms of those kingdoms. That a princess like Mary would at once consent to such a renunciation was not to be expected. She had been flattered into the belief that her pretensions were sound and valid. Their assumption had invested her with additional importance in the eyes of Europe. She had been promised assistance from various quarters, if she resolved to vindicate her rights by force of arms. The Roman Catholics of England—a numerous and active party—would willingly have seated her on the throne. On the other hand, she was acknowledged, even by the Protestants, as the legitimate heir of Elizabeth. In these circumstances we can easily understand her unwillingness to consent to the ratification of a treaty which deprived her of the advantages of her position, and forced her to surrender the ambitious hope, which she had hitherto so assiduously cherished, of attaining to the English crown. Elizabeth, on her part, was not insensible to the advantages to be gained by extorting from Mary the ratification of an article, in the formation of which she had not been consulted. In this way she would be delivered forever from the pretensions of a dangerous rival, and be left at liberty to alter the order of succession by authority of Parliament, and transfer the crown to some other descendant of the royal blood. Such an alternative would have been every way congenial to her disposition and desires. It is not, therefore, a matter of surprise that she laboured, through means of her ambassador, to persuade the Queen of Scots to adopt a course which would contribute so materially to advance her interests. We have seen, however, that Mary, under various pretences, still contrived to gain time, and to elude her request. "And, while the one queen solicited with persevering importunity, and the other evaded with artful delay, they both studied an extreme politeness of behaviour, and loaded each other with professions of sisterly love, with reciprocal declarations of unchangeable esteem and amity."*

Mary, in compliance with the solicitations of her subjects, and the advice of her Mary proposes uncles, the Princes of Lorraine, for her departure, had long determined to return to her own dominions. Her departure had been delayed for some time by the various proposals which were now made for her hand in marriage. These had emanated from the King of Denmark, the King of Sweden, and the Prince of Spain; an alliance with the latter being at one time probable, and creating much alarm to the English ambassador. This negotiation, however, not being concluded, she now began, with much unwillingness, to prepare for her voyage. Fondly attached to a country in which she had lived from childhood, where she had spent the few hours of the only happiness she ever knew—naturally attracted by the elegance, splendour, and gaiety of a polite court—she contemplated with anxiety her appearance in her own country, where her subjects though loyal-hearted, were rude in their manners and turbulent in their conduct; and contrasting the difficulties of her position with her own inexperience, it was, doubtless, with painful apprehensions that she made up her mind to bid adieu to her beloved France, and undertake the discharge of her important but onerous duties. In order to the security of her

to proceed to England and solicit this favour. From thence he was to pursue his journey into Scotland, to prepare her subjects for the arrival of their queen. But it was the misfortune of this princess to repose her confidence in persons totally unworthy of so high a trust. On this occasion, D'Osell acted with deliberate treachery. Not only did he communicate to Throckmorton her intended movements, but disclosed them to Elizabeth; and instead of proceeding on his mission, he allowed himself to be sent back to Paris with the tidings that the passport he had requested had been ignominiously refused. Nothing could be more ungenerous or pitiful than this proceeding of the English queen. A letter which Cecil addressed at this time to the Earl of Sussex serves to explain and account for this crooked policy: "Monsieur D'Osell," he says, "came from the Scots queen with the request that the queen, his mistress, might have a safe conduct to pass along our sea coasts, and himself to pass into Scotland to provide for her coming. Many reasons moved us to dislike her passage; but this only served us for answer, that where she had promised to send the queen's majesty a good answer for the ratification of the last league of peace, made at Edinburgh, and now had sent none, her majesty would not disguise with her, but plainly would forbear to show her such pleasure until she should ratify it; and, that done, she should not only have free passage, but all helps and gratuities. Monsieur D'Osell was also gently required to return with this answer; what will follow we will shortly see."*

But not only did Elizabeth refuse the safe-conduct, she also adopted measures for intercepting and detaining the Scottish queen. She dared not act in this matter openly, as this would be to violate all the courtesies usually observed by one sovereign towards another; and the attempt she meditated would be reprobated by all Europe. She had, therefore, recourse to stratagem; and, under the pretence of securing the seas for pirates, by which they were then much infested, she gave orders that her fleet should hover about the coasts, and watch the passage of the French ships. On the 20th of July, Throckmorton had an interview with Mary, at which he explained to her, on the part of his sovereign, the reasons why she had been refused a safe conduct. Mary, on this occasion, manifested a proper feeling of indignation at the unworthy treatment she had experienced, and expressed herself in spirited terms: "There is nothing," said she "that doth grieve me more than that I did so forget myself as to require of the queen, your mistress, that favour which I had no need to ask. I needed no more to make her privy to my journey, than she doth me of hers. I may pass well enough home into mine own realm, I think, without her passport or licence; for though the late king, your master, used all the impeachment (hindrance) he could, both to stay me, and to catch me as I came hither; yet you know, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, I came hither safely, and I may have as good means to help me home again as I had to come hither, if I would employ my friends. You have, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, oftentimes told me, that the amity between the queen, your mistress, and me was very necessary and profitable for us both. I have reason now to think the queen, your mistress, is not of that mind; for I am sure, if she were, she would not have refused me thus unkindly. I asked her," she continued, "nothing but friendship. I do not trouble her state, nor practise with her subjects; and yet I know there be in her realm that be inclined enough to hear offers. I know also they be not of the mind she is of, neither in religion nor in other things. The queen, your mistress, doth say I am young, and do lack experience; but I have age enough, and experience to use myself towards my friends and kinsfolk friendly and uprightly; and I trust my discretion shall not so fail me that my passion shall move me to use other language of her than becometh a queen and my next kinswoman. Well, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, I could tell you that I am as she is, a queen—allied and friended as is known—and I tell you also, that my heart is not inferior to hers, so as an equal respect could be had betwixt us on both parts."* At this interview, Throckmorton introduced again, and for the last time, the subject of the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh, and the assumption by Mary of the arms and title of England. As to the first, she replied, she had no other answer to give than what she had formerly advanced—viz., that previous to her coming to a final decision, it was necessary that the matter should be laid before parliament, and deliberated upon by that body. As to the second, she affirmed she was not responsible for what had been done in the name and by the authority of her father-in-law, Henry II.; but that since his death, and that of her husband, she had neither borne the arms nor used the title of England.

On the following day, the English ambassador took formal leave of Mary, and expressed his concern that a regard to his duty did not permit him to wait upon her at her embarkation. "If," said the young queen, almost in the spirit of prophecy, "my preparations were not so much advanced,"

they are, peradventure, the queen, your mistress's, unkindness might stay my voyage; but now I am determined to adventure the matter whatsoever come of it. I trust the wind will be so favourable, as I shall not need to come on the coast of England, and if I do, then, Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, the queen, your mistress, shall have me in her hands to do her will of me; and if she be so hard-hearted as to desire my end, she may then do her pleasure, and make sacrifice of me; peradventure that casualty might be better for me than to live. In this matter, God's will be fulfilled."*

On the 25th of July the queen departed from St. Germain with the intention of embarking at Calais. She had been accompanied in her journey from Paris by the King of France, Catherine de Medicis, the King of Navarre, and a numerous retinue of nobles and princes. In her passage through Normandy she was attended by a train of illustrious persons, including the Duke of Guise and the Cardinals of Lorraine and Guise. "All the bravest and noblest gentlemen," says one of Mary's French biographers, "assembled themselves around the fairest of queens and women." Arriving at Calais on the 9th of August, she found that few preparations had been made for her voyage, and that the only available vessels were two galleys and two transports. Intelligence in the meantime reached her of the intentions of Elizabeth to intercept her passage. She then determined on a scheme, which, while apparently indicative of irresolution and fear, in reality afforded her an opportunity of exhibiting her courage, and successfully baffling the designs of her vigilant enemies. With this view she dispatched Lord Henry Stewart, Abbot of St. Colme, to the English queen, with a second request to be favoured with a safe conduct. Mary had no intention of awaiting the return of her messenger; but, after being detained at Calais for five days by contrary winds, she boldly embarked and put to sea. It was on the fourteenth of August, a sad and trying hour, which witnessed her last farewell to the land of her adoption. She looked at her friends, pressed her hands on her heart, and parted from them in silence expressive of an anguish too great for utterance. For many hours she remained leaning on the gallery of the vessel, and gazing with looks of the deepest grief on the country she was leaving for ever. Refusing to retire to her cabin, she ordered, on the approach of night, a temporary shelter to be erected on the deck. Owing to the calm which prevailed, the vessel made little progress, and in the morning the coast of France was still visible. This intelligence having been communicated to the queen, she raised herself from her couch, straining her eyes to catch a last look of the receding land, and exclaimed as it faded away, "Farewell France; beloved country, I shall never see thee more!"* Under cover of a dense fog, Mary was enabled to escape the vigilance of the English ships. One of her vessels indeed was captured and carried into port, but was released as soon as it was discovered that the Scottish queen was not on board; and, after a prosperous voyage, she arrived at Leith on the 15th of August, 1561.

* The following beautiful lines, said to have been written by Mary on leaving France, are taken from an interesting volume published in 1835, entitled Selections of the French Poetesses, edited by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, A.B. The Chanson may be also seen in the Anthologie Française, tom. i. No. 10:—

CHAPTER XXVIII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

A.D. 1542—1560.

DURING the reign of James V., the principles of the Reformation had made considerable progress in Scotland. Not a few individuals of rank and influence had become convinced of the unscriptural character of the Papal system, and vast numbers of the people throughout the country were sighing for a better order of things. The clergy were thoroughly alarmed, and, as they had secured a preponderating influence in the royal counsels, they were projecting measures, under the able guidance of Cardinal Beaton, for the complete suppression of the new doctrines. Their machinations, however, were defeated by the unexpected demise of the king; and the long minority which ensued, with its intrigues and struggles of opposing factions for supremacy, proved upon the whole favourable to the progress of the principles of the Reformation.

Strenuous efforts were made by the Cardinal to secure for himself the reins of government; but his claims were set aside, and James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, who was next heir to the crown, was invested with the office of Regent during the minority of the infant queen. This appointment gave general satisfaction. The Regent was favourable to the principles of the Reformation, and the friends of truth and liberty expected that his exaltation would give an impulse to the cause which was dearest to their hearts. And, for a time, there was every prospect that these hopes would be completely realised. The chaplains whom the Regent employed in his own house were Thomas Williams, a man described by Knox* as "of solid judgment, reasonable letters, and prompt and good utterance," and John Rough, characterised by the same authority as "not so learned, yet more simple, and more vehement against all impiety." These men preached the Gospel with zeal and faithfulness, their position secured for them the attention of multitudes; and the assaults which they made upon the Pope's authority, the adoration of images, and the invocation of saints—whilst they stirred up the rage of the Romish clergy, who exclaimed that Williams and Rough would carry the governor to the devil—contributed very greatly to the advancement of sound religious views.

But the most important measure by far that signalled the commencement of the new government, was an act passed by the estates assembled in parliament, 15th March, 1542-3,† authorising all men to read the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue. There were laws in existence against the importation of heretical books, and against the use of works translated by heretics from other languages, which were also, though not formally abrogated by this statute, to a great extent neutralised by it. Keen opposition was given to these changes by the clergy, who argued that Latin, Greek, and Hebrew were the only tongues in which the Church allowed the Holy Scriptures to be read. But it was alleged, in answer to this argument, that if the Gospel was to be preached to all nations, as Christ commanded, it must be preached to them in languages which they understood; and if they might hear it, why, it was asked, might they not equally read it, in their own tongues? It was then argued by the clergy, that the common translation was not a correct one; but as the only defect which they were prepared to point out in it was the use of the word 'love' instead of 'charity,' as the rendering of ἀγάπη, it was finally decreed by Act of Parliament, that all men should be allowed to use the existing translation till the prelates should produce a more correct one. The act ran in the following terms: "It is statute and ordained that it shall be lawful to all our Sovereign Lady's lieges to have the Holy Writ, to wit, the New Testament and Old, in the vulgar tongue, in English or Scotch, of a good and true translation: and that they shall incur no crimes for the having and reading of the same, providing always that no man dispute or hold opinions, under the pains contained in the Acts of Parliament."* Previously to this period, the reading even of the Lord's Prayer, or of the Ten Commandments, or of the Articles of the Creed, in the English tongue, was sufficient to expose a man to the charge of heresy; and those who ventured to read the Bible were obliged to do so in secret, and to conceal the book from the prying eyes of unfriendly neighbours. But now the Scriptures might be seen lying openly upon many a table; they were read with eagerness by thousands; they were made the subject of conversation between friends when they met together; and thus a mighty impulse was given to the progress of the pure doctrines of the Gospel. Although the new law only authorised the reading of the Scriptures, yet mention had been made, by those who craved the interference of parliament, of treatises containing wholesome doctrine; and works accordingly began to be published in which the craft, and tyranny, and abuses of the Church of Rome were exposed, and productions of a similar character were imported in large numbers from the sister kingdom.†

The sincerity of the Governor in consenting to the act permitting the reading of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue was evinced by the fact, that not only did he make public proclamation of it at the market cross of Edinburgh, immediately after the close of parliament, but he also employed the English ambassador, Sadler, to procure a supply of Bibles from England, that all who desired copies of the Holy Scriptures might readily obtain them.* And he likewise expressed an earnest wish to the ambassador, that when books were published by authority in England, setting forth the doctrines of religion established and proved by the Word of God, they should be sent to him, that he might publish them in Scotland also for the benefit of the people.†

At this time an alliance of peace and marriage was concluded with England, which was opposed by the staunch adherents of Rome, but generally approved of by the supporters of the new doctrines, both as promising to terminate the Border-wars, which had so long wasted the strength of both kingdoms, and as calculated to check the tyrannical and persecuting measures by which the church of Rome sought to uphold her power.

The hopes inspired by the wise and liberal measures of parliament, and by the Regent's change of policy. Regent's apparent earnestness in carrying them out, were soon blasted. Though he was disposed himself to adhere to the principles which had procured for his government the general respect of the country, yet, being somewhat infirm of purpose, he was unable to compete with the astute and strong-willed Cardinal, who, through the representations of Hamilton, Abbot of Paisley, and David Panter, afterwards Bishop of Ross, subtle and accomplished men, so wrought upon his fears, that he recoiled from the danger of doing aught in opposition to the authority of Rome, and was even brought to believe that the legitimacy of his title to the earldom of Arran depended upon her sentence. The first symptoms of his change of views appeared in the coldness which he began to manifest towards his chaplains, and the increasing insults which he allowed to be heaped upon them; in consequence of which, they were under the necessity of retiring from court. Very soon all his advisers, Sir David Lindsay, Kirkaldy of Grange, and Balnaves, whose wise counsels had shed so much lustre upon the commencement of his regency, were driven from the position which they occupied. And, in the end, the Regent, finding that the Cardinal's influence was daily augmenting, not only violated the engagements which he had made with England, but proceeded from Holyrood House to Stirling, and formally reanted his principles, received absolution from the hands of the Cardinal, and was reconciled publicly to the Church of Rome.‡ From this moment, though he retained the office of governor, yet it was merely the shadow of authority which he possessed. All real power passed into the hands of the Cardinal, who was not slow to wield it for his own purposes.

* It cannot be determined with any certainty whether an edition of the Scriptures in the vulgar tongue was printed at this time in Scotland or not.

Immediately after the governor's renunciation of Protestant principles, an Act of Measures adopted Parliament was passed at Edin- for the suppression burgh, 15th December, 1543, for tion of heresy. the suppression of heresy, which was described as greatly on the increase; and all prelates and ordinaries were admonished to proceed against suspected persons, according to the rules of the church. It was also declared in the act that the lord governor would at all times be ready to do in such cases what was required of his office.* Nor did the Cardinal fail speedily to set an example of the manner in which it was his desire that heretics should be treated; for in the following month, when he was at Perth, making a visitation of his diocese, with the governor in his company, † a number of individuals of both sexes were brought to trial before him, of whom several were banished, and five were put to death. These five—viz., four men and a woman—were accused of violating the late Act of Parliament, and frequenting meet- Four men and a woman executed at Perth on a charge of heresy. ings where the scriptures were not only read, but also expounded.

One of them, Robert Lamb, a merchant in Perth, was further charged with publicly contradicting Friar Spence, who had taught that prayers to departed saints were indispensable to salvation. Other two of them, William Anderson, maltman, and James Ronaldson, skinner, were accused of nailing the horns of a ram to the head of an image of St. Francis, and eating a goose on All-Hallow-even. Nothing special was laid to the charge of James Hunter, the fourth individual, but only that he had kept company with the others, and concurred in their proceedings. The woman, Helen Stark, was the wife of James Ronaldson, and the particular crime laid to her charge was, that when in child-bed, and exhorted by her attendants to pray to the Virgin Mary, she had declared she would pray only to God, for Christ's sake, and had also said that it was not any superior merit of the Virgin, but God's free grace, which had raised her to the honour of being the mother of Jesus. For these offences, sentence of death was passed upon all the five. Great intercession was made to the governor to grant them a pardon, and he was himself inclined to spare them; but being entirely under the influence of the Cardinal, who was bent upon their destruction, he could not venture to annul the sentence.‡ The men were hanged at the ordinary place of ex-

† Bishop Keith places the Cardinal's visit to Perth considerably later, and questions the accuracy of the date assigned by Knox. But Mr. Laing, editor of Knox's works (vol. i. p. 117), adduces sundry quotations from the treasurer's accounts, which describe the governor as being at Stirling in Jan., 1543-4, and as proceeding from thence to St. Johnstone for the punishment of certain heretics. Mr. Laing's "Chronicle of Perth" also contains this notice.—"The execution of James Hunter, Robert Lamb, James Ronaldson, and his spouse, at Perth, in January, on St. Paul's-day, 1543-4 years." ecution, the spectacle being witnessed, it is said, by the Cardinal and his companions from the Spy Tower in the Earl of Gowrie's garden. They encountered death with much firmness and constancy, encouraging one another with the hope of supping together in the kingdom of heaven that night, and exhorting the people who were gathered around them to fear God, and to forsake the errors of Popery. The woman was desirous of dying with her husband; but this request being refused, she followed him to the place of execution, exhorted him to perseverance and patience, for Christ's sake, and at parting thus addressed him:—"Husband, rejoice, for we have lived together many joyful days; but this day, in which we must die, ought to be most joyful to us both, because we now shall have joy for ever. Therefore, I will not bid you good-night, for we shall shortly meet with joy in the kingdom of heaven." Immediately after his death, she was hurried away to the river Tay with her infant child in her arms, and there, having resigned her babe into the hands of a nurse, and commended her other children to the sympathy of friends and to the care of God, she was cast into a deep pool, and died full of faith and Christian hope.* What a shocking thing it is, that such deeds should have been done in the name of religion! Yet there are some historians who can make respectful mention of the men who were actors in these atrocious proceedings, whilst they hold up to scorn the friends of the Reformation as coarse and intolerant bigots, for merely speaking of ungodly persecutors with severity. †

† The editor of Keith's History is at great pains to extenuate the conduct of the Cardinal at Perth. He thinks it probable that the conduct of the whole of the parties executed there had been peculiarly violent and offensive; and he conceives it to be a palliation of Beaton's share in the proceedings, that James VI. hanged Francis Tennent sixty-five years afterwards for writing pasquils against himself; that the same monarch allowed Archibald Cornwall to be executed in 1601, for exhibiting the royal portrait on a gibbet; that in 1615 John Fleming was hanged for uttering treasonable, blasphemous, and damnable speeches against the same king. Therefore Cardinal Beaton was not greatly to blame for hanging four men and drowning one woman at Perth, who, it is probable, had behaved in a violent manner. The logic of this is inimitable. And Mr. Parker Lawson might have strengthened his case, by producing not three, but thirty thousand monstrous crimes that darken the page of history. The object of the note, however, is to suggest the idea that the Protestants have been as bad as the Romanists in regard to persecution. Now the cases produced are altogether irrelevant to this view of the subject. What is wanting is a case in which the Scottish Reformers brought five Romanists, aye, or even one, to trial purely on account of their religious tenets, and hanged, or drowned, or burned them! When this case is produced we will not blame the Cardinal less, but we will blame the Protestants more, than we have been in the habit of doing. The unfairness of Mr. Lawson is most offensive. Whilst he extenuates the conduct of the Cardinal in the proceedings at Perth, he can find no terms black enough to depict the guilt of those who slew the Cardinal himself. Might he not have given them the benefit also of the arbitrary and cruel acts which he cites as specimens of what was done in those times? If the fact that an age is barbarous is to modify our view, as certainly it should, of the actions of one man, it ought to be applied in the same manner to the actions of all. The assassins of the Cardinal ought not to be tried by the maxims of the present age, while the Cardinal himself is judged by the maxims of his own. In-

Other instances of the Cardinal's persecuting fury, in the shape of fines, imprisonment, and executions, occurred in various parts of the country; but the one that excited the deepest indignation, and exhibited the bloodthirsty character of the enemies of the Reformation in the clearest light, was the martyrdom of George Wishart, brother of the Laird of Pittarrow, in Mearns. This man was endowed with a singular gift of eloquence; his attainments in knowledge, both secular and sacred, were very extensive; his gentleness and modesty won for him universal esteem and love; and he was devotedly attached to the pure doctrines of the Gospel of Christ. Nothing is known regarding his early years. He first appears as a teacher of the Greek tongue in Montrose, at the time Erskine of Dun was provost of that place; but having presumed to instruct his pupils in the Greek Testament, he was threatened with a prosecution by Hepburn, Bishop of Brechin, which obliged him to retire from Montrose, and even to leave his native country. Traces of him are next found in Bristol, where he became a preacher of the Gospel, and denounced the worship and mediation of the Virgin, declaring, as the records of that city state, that Christ's mother neither had nor could have merit for him nor for us; but his faith had not yet attained full vigour, for when he was brought before the ecclesiastical authorities, and condemned as a heretic, he recanted, and, according to the custom observed in such cases, burned a faggot in the church of St. Nicholas. After spending some time in Germany and Switzerland, to which he refers in the answers he gave during his trial at St. Andrew's, he found his way to Cambridge, where he became a member of Corpus Christi College, and both prosecuted his studies with diligence and faithfully superintended the studies of others.* Whilst there he was noted for his piety, his self-denial, and his charity to the poor. One of his pupils, Emery Tylney, bears most honourable and affectionate testimony to the agreeableness of his manners and the distinguished excellence of his conduct. "He was a man of tall stature, black-haired, long-bearded, comely of personage, well-spoken after his country of Scotland, courteous, lowly, lovely, glad to teach, desirous to learn, and was well travelled; having on him for his clothing never but a mantle or fricze gown to the shoes, a black millian fustian doublet, and plain black hosen, coarse new canvas for his shirts, and white falling bands, and cuffs at his hands.

deed, Beaton is less entitled to this kind of consideration than any other man of his times, for being vastly superior to the bulk of his countrymen in point of talent, and far beyond them in respect of mental culture, not to speak of his priestly character, he ought to have been greatly in advance of them also in humanity and all the virtues. The maxims of the present age may be applied to him more fairly and justly than to any of his contemporaries.—Keith's History, vol. i. pp. 100, 113.

* Keith's History of the Affairs of Church and State vol. i. p. 103. Knox's History, vol. i. p. 535. McCrie's Life of Knox, vol. i. p. 383.

He was a man modest, temperate, fearing God, hating covetousness—for his charity had never an end, night, noon, nor day; he forbare one meal in three, one day in four for the most part, except something to comfort nature. He lay upon a puff of straw and coarse new canvas sheets, which, when he changed, he gave away. He had commonly by his bed-side a tub of water, in the which, his people being in bed and the candle put out, he used to bathe himself. He taught with great modesty and gravity, so that some of his people thought him severe, and would have slain him, but the Lord was his defence. And he, after due correction for their malice, by good exhortation amended them and went his way. Oh! that the Lord had left him to me, his poor boy, that he might have finished what he had begun. If I should declare his love to me and all men—his charity to the poor, in giving, relieving, caring, helping, providing—yea, infinitely studying how to do good unto all and hurt to none—I should sooner want words than just cause to commend him. All this I testify with my whole heart and truth of this godly man. He that made all, governeth all, and shall judge all, knoweth that I speak the truth, that the simple may be satisfied, the arrogant confounded, the hypocrite disclosed.*

Entertaining an ardent desire to advance the knowledge of the Gospel in his native land, Wishart returned to Scotland, in company with the commissioners who had been sent to conclude the treaty with Henry VIII. The towns of Montrose and Dundee were the places which he chiefly frequented, and there he preached with such zeal and persuasiveness, commenting for the most part, upon the Epistle to the Romans, that all who heard him were filled with admiration, and many, by the blessing of God, were brought to the saving knowledge of the truth, and renounced the errors of Popery.

The effects of Wishart's preaching were soon reported to Cardinal Beaton, who took measures for compelling him to remove from these places. He was openly forbidden by Robert Myle, one of the principal men of Dundee, to trouble the town any more with his doctrines, for they would not tolerate his preaching; and finding that he could not maintain his position with any prospect of safety or usefulness, he withdrew, warning the citizens of the guilt which they incurred by putting the gospel away from them. From Dundee he proceeded to the west country, and, notwithstanding the opposition that was given to him by the Archbishop of Glasgow, he preached to multitudes in Ayr, Galston,

Mauchline, and other places, and thus scattered very widely the seeds of Christian knowledge, which were afterwards quickened into growth by the courageous and faithful testimony which he bore to the truth at the time of his martyrdom. He was led very soon to terminate his labours in the west, by the intelligence which reached him, that the plague had broken out at Dundee. In the benevolent spirit of the Gospel, which repays good for evil, he set it to be his duty to visit his former hearers in their affliction; and, disregarding the danger, he remained amongst them, indefatigably preaching the Gospel, and ministering to the temporal necessities of the afflicted, until the plague had almost wholly disappeared. During his stay in Dundee on this trying occasion, an attempt was made upon his life by a Romish priest, who stood while he was preaching with a dagger concealed under his mantle, ready to pierce him as he descended; but something in the man's appearance exciting his suspicion, he caught his hand, and the assassin was immediately seized by the crowd, who would have taken summary vengeance upon him, but for Wishart's prompt and generous intercession. From Dundee he proceeded to Montrose, to establish and confirm the friends of Christ in that quarter, and while he was there he met with a very remarkable deliverance. A letter was put into his hands, as if from his intimate friend the Laird of Kinross, desiring him to come with all expedition, as he had been seized with sudden sickness; but, after he had left the town, the idea was forcibly impressed upon his mind that the message was a fabrication of his enemies to lure him into their hands; and therefore, remaining behind himself, he sent forward some of his friends, who soon came upon sixty horsemen, waiting at an angle of the road to intercept him.

From Montrose, after an interval of a few days, he went southward, and preached in Leath, Inveresk, and Haddington. When he was leaving the latter place, he said to John Knox, who was preparing to go with him as usual, "Nay, return to your pupils; one is enough at this time for a sacrifice." He went with the Laird of Ormiston to the Earl of Bothwell, to spend the night at his residence; but shortly after he had retired to rest, the house was surrounded by armed men, and the Earl of Bothwell, calling for the laird, required him to deliver up his guest, assuring him it was vain to attempt resistance, for the Cardinal and the Regent were at hand with all their power. At the same time, he pledged his honour for the safety of Wishart's person, and declared that he would either keep him in his own house, or restore him to his friends. These promises, however, were all violated, for the Cardinal and the Queen-dowager exerted all their influence with Bothwell to obtain possession of Wishart, and he was lodged in the castle of Edinburgh, and after a few days transferred to St. Andrew's.

Having now got hold of his long-sought victim, the Cardinal, with all possible expedition, summoned a council of the bishops and clergy to meet at St. Andrew's for the trial of Wishart, on the charge of heresy; and at the same time he applied to the Regent for the appointment of a civil judge to perform the part required of the secular law in cases of conviction for this offence. Earnest solici-vours were made by Hamilton of Preston to convince the Regent of the wickedness of the measures which were contemplated against Wishart, and of the guilt and danger which he would incur by giving his sanction to them; and such an impression was produced upon his mind by these remonstrances, that he wrote to the Cardinal not to precipitate the trial, but to await his coming, as he could not consent to the destruction of any man till the cause was very fully tried.* The Cardinal, however, though he little expected such an answer, was not to be diverted from his purpose. Such a triumph over heresy as was now within his reach was not to be so easily relinquished. He feared that delay might lead to the prisoner's escape, and the thorough examination which the Governor proposed was by no means what he wanted. He therefore signified his purpose of proceeding with the trial at once, assuring the Governor that he had written to him, not because he needed his consent, but because he desired that the heretic's condemnation might have the countenance of his authority. The proceedings against Wishart thus lost everything like the colour of a public judicial act; and the martyr's death was as really a private murder as the Cardinal's own subsequent assassination.

When Wishart was brought before the bishops and other clergy convened by the Cardinal for his trial, he appealed to the lord-governor, as supreme authority in the kingdom, because he denied the competency and had no confidence in the integrity of the court at whose bar he stood; but his appeal was disregarded. Eighteen accusations were read against him by John Lauder, touching the doctrines he had preached, to all of which, though expressed in a style of course invective and bitter malignity, he replied with great meekness, and with ready command of scripture. The first, second, and last charges may be stated as fair specimens of the whole:—"Thou false heretic, renegade, traitor, and thief, deceiver of the people, thou despisest the holy church, and in like case contemnest my lord-governor's authority. And this we know for surety, that when thou preachedst in Dundee, and was charged by my lord-governor's authority to desist, nevertheless thou would not obey, but persevered in the same. And therefore the Bishop of Brechin cursed thee, and delivered thee into the devil's hands, and gave thee in commandment that thou shouldst preach no more. That, notwithstanding, thou didst continue obstinately." Wishart's answer to this charge ran in the following terms:—"My Lords, I have read in the Acts of the Apostles, that it is not lawful to desist from the preaching of the Gospel for the threats and menaces of men. Therefore, it is written, Acts v., "We should obey God rather than man." Also I have read in the prophet Malachi, "I shall curse your blessings, and bless your cursings." (Mal. ii.) I believe firmly that the Lord will turn ^{The charges} your cursings into blessings. An- ^{against Wishart.} other charge ran in these words: "Thou, false heretic, didst say that the priest standing at the altar saying mass, was like a fox wagging his tail in July." To which Wishart answered: "My lords, I said not so. These were my sayings: The moving of the body outward, without the inward moving of the heart, is nought else but the playing of an ape, and not the true serving of God." The last accusation rose somewhat above the ordinary jargon of the rest, and related to the immortality of the soul. It was couched in the following terms: "Thou, false heretic, hath preached openly, saying that the soul of man shall sleep to the latter day of judgment, and so shall not obtain life immortal until that day." To which Wishart replied: "God, full of mercies and goodness, forgive them that say such things of me. I wot, and know surely by the Word of God, that he who hath begun to have the faith of Jesus Christ, and believeth firmly in him, I know surely that the soul of that man shall never sleep, but ever shall live in immortal life." The other accusations had reference to the number of the sacraments, auricular confession, the bread of the Lord's Supper, extreme unction, holy water, the priesthood of believers, the eating of flesh upon Friday, prayer to saints, purgatory, the marriage of priests, fasting, and the obedience due to general councils;* to all of which the doomed martyr returned answers grounded upon the Word of God, and expressed in language clear, respectful, and impressive.

As might have been expected, the Cardinal's council of bishops and abbots, blind to ^{Wishart's} the beautiful spectacle of Christian ^{condemnation.} meekness and purity presented to their view, and wholly unmoved by the profound reverence of God that pervaded all Wishart uttered, at once found the charge of heresy established against him, and condemned him to be burned at the stake. He took his stand upon the Holy Scriptures, refusing to believe anything that could not be established by their authority, but bowing with implicit submission to whatever they taught; and for this he was judged worthy of death by the ministers of a church professing to regard the Bible as a revelation from God.

The execution of the sentence was delayed till the following day. The greater ^{Execution of the} part of the night was spent by ^{sentence,} Wishart in prayer, and next ^{March 1, 1546.} morning he was visited by two friars, who desired him to confess to them; but he declined their services, though he had a conference with Winram, the superior, who seems to have been a man of religious principle, and already dissatisfied with the Church of Rome. At the request of the captain of the castle, he took breakfast with him; and as he had been refused the privilege of having the Lord's Supper administered to him, he took the opportunity of praying aloud for the divine blessing upon a portion of the bread and wine that were upon the table, and distributed them to those present, exhorting them to mutual love, to the fear of God, and to the leading of holy lives. Having spent some time alone in prayer, and the appointed hour having now arrived, he was brought out by two executioners, who dressed him in a black coat of linen, and fastened some bags of gunpowder upon various parts of his body. The scaffold was erected with a tree in the centre of it, to which the prisoner was to be bound; and, lest the friends of Wishart should attempt to rescue him, the guns of the castle were all directed to the fatal spot, and soldiers were posted in readiness beside them. The windows of the fore-tower, too, were adorned with tapestry, and couches were spread with rich cushions, from which the Cardinal and the prelates might have the opportunity of beholding at their ease the triumph of their wicked and cruel machinations. And proclamation was made through the town, by order of the Cardinal, forbidding any person to pray for the heretic, under pain of the severest censures of the church.*

When Wishart was brought to the stake, he prayed thus three times:—"O, thou Saviour of the world, have mercy on me! Father of the world, have mercy on me! Father of the world, have mercy on me! I commend my spirit into thy holy hands." And before the fire was kindled, he thus addressed the crowd gathered around him:—"I beseech you, Christian brethren, that ye be not offended in the Word of God, for the afflictions and torments which ye see already prepared for me. But I exhort you that ye love the Word of God, and suffer patiently and with a comfortable heart for the Word's sake, which is your undoubted salvation and everlasting comfort. Moreover, I pray you show my brethren and sisters, which have heard me oft before, that they cease not, nor leave off the Word of God, which I taught unto them after the grace given to me, for any persecutions or troubles in this world, which lasteth not; and show unto them that my doctrine was no old wives' fables after the constitutions of men. And if I had taught men's doctrine, I had gotten great thanks from men; but for the Word's sake and true evangel, which was given to me by the grace of God, I suffer this day by men, not sorrowfully, but with a glad heart and mind. For this cause I was woe, that I should suffer the fire for Christ's sake. Consider and behold my visage. Ye shall not see me change my colour. This grim fire I fear not. And so I pray you not to fear them that slay the body, but afterwards have no power to slay the soul. Some have said of me that I taught that the soul of man should sleep until the last day; but I know surely, and my faith is such, that my soul shall sup with my Saviour Christ this night, ere it be six hours, for whom I suffer this."

He continued alive some time after the gunpowder exploded; and when the captain of the castle, perceiving this, drew near, and exhorted him to be of good courage, it is recorded by some that he replied:—"This fire torments my body, yet does not disturb my mind; but he who now so proudly looks down upon me from his high place will within a few days be as ignominiously thrown over as he now arrogantly reclines."

These are the terms in which it is alleged by Buchanan and Spottiswood† that Altered prophecy Wishart predicted the death of of Wishart. Cardinal Beaton; and certainly they correspond with marvellous accuracy to the event. Doubts, however, may be entertained respecting the reality of this supposed prophecy. It is not mentioned by Fox, or by Knox, who could hardly have been ignorant of the prediction had it really been uttered. And therefore, the probability is that the general terms which Knox says the martyr did employ—"if they will not convert themselves from their wicked error, there shall hastily come upon them the wrath of God, which they shall not eschew"‡—were afterwards made more specific and circumstantial. It is certain that the body of the Cardinal was exposed, in order to satisfy the people that he was really dead, at the same window from which he is said to have exultingly gazed upon the dying agonies of Wishart; and so striking a fact was in itself calculated to arrest attention, and might very naturally cause words that merely denounced God's judgment against impious transgressors to be so altered in process of time as to seem a specific prediction of the persecutor's doom. It is true there is the same authority for the prophetic words that there is for the fact of gazing from the window—viz., that of Buchanan and Spottiswood. But words were far more likely to be altered in the process of repetition, than such a broad and palpable fact was to be invented altogether. We may therefore question whether any such denunciation was really made by

* Keith's History, vol. i. p. 103. Bishop Keith, and the editor of his history, both doubt whether there be evidence to prove that the Cardinal witnessed Wishart's incrimination; and certainly the evidence for this fact is not so strong as for the other circumstances mentioned. It is not noticed by Fox; it is not mentioned in the first edition of Knox's History; it has no place in Sir David Lindsay's Tragedy of Cardinal Beaton. David Buchanan, however, records it in his edition of Knox, published in London in 1644; and a much higher authority, Archbishop Spottiswood (p. 81) seems to entertain no doubt of it. Besides, George Buchanan, a contemporary historian, states it as an undoubted fact. (Vol. ii. p. 357.) Nor is it in itself a very unlikely circumstance. The Cardinal plainly was bent upon having Wishart destroyed, and the direction of the guns of the castle to the spot shows his fear that possibly there might be an attempt to rescue him. Is it therefore improbable that, being in the castle at the time, he would watch with his own eyes, that he might be ready to issue orders at the first appearance of any commotion? And the man who could forbid the sympathising people from offering up prayers for the sufferer, under pain of the heaviest ecclesiastical censures, cannot be supposed to have been troubled with any such yearnings of humanity, as would make it painful for him to witness the dying struggles of his tortured victim.

Wishart, as reported by Buchanan and Spottiswood; whether, in short, he said more than any other preacher might have declared in similar circumstances; and yet not be under the necessity of rejecting the palpable fact recorded by these same historians, that the Cardinal gazed upon the execution from a couch conveniently placed in a window.

The death of Wishart was regarded as a signal triumph by the enemies of the Reformation. The priests extolled the Cardinal to the skies for the energy and boldness with which, in despite of the Governor's authority, he had taken vengeance upon the heretic. Everywhere they might be heard vaunting, "if the church in former times had found such a protector, matters had not been reduced to the doubtful terms wherein they now stand, but long ere his time, by her own power and authority, she had been able to maintain herself." And the Cardinal himself was delighted with the success of his measures. One most dangerous individual who had long escaped him was cut off, and the severity of the blow, it was imagined, would strike terror into the hearts of all who held the same opinions. But the feelings of men throughout the country were shocked by the cruelty, and disgusted by the illegality of the proceedings at St. Andrew's. The mild and blameless character of Wishart was universally known, and a very large number of persons were persuaded that it was not heresy, but the pure Gospel of Christ for which he had suffered. Much indignation was excited among all ranks of men, and the cruelty and tyranny of the Cardinal were declared to be quite insufferable.

These feelings, whilst they actuated multitudes throughout the country, acquired an overwhelming strength in the breasts of a few individuals, of whom some also were urged on by the desire of revenge for private wrongs, and some had long before been hired by English gold.* These men, of whom the principal were Norman Leslie, son of the Earl of Rothes; John Leslie, his uncle; William Kirkaldy, of Grange; Peter Carmichael, of Fife; and James Melville, of the house of Carnbee, formed a conspiracy against the Cardinal's life; and having obtained admission into the castle of St. Andrew's whilst it was under repair, they executed their purpose on the 29th May, 1546. The unhappy man, amidst the agonies of death, continued crying, "I am a priest! I am a priest! Ye will not slay me. I am a priest! I am a priest! Fy! fy! all is gone."

Nothing can justify the assassination of Beaton; no wrongs, either public or private, the conspirators can warrant the taking away of life otherwise than by legal process. The individuals who were accessory to the Cardinal's death brought a foul stain upon their own names, and also upon the party with which they were connected. Yet it must be remembered that the murder of the Cardinal was not approved and applauded amongst the Reformers, as the burning of Wishart was amongst the Romanists. Doubtless there were some who approved the act itself on the ground—very dangerous and not at all to be defended, but yet, at the same time, very distinguishable from the indiscriminate right of private vengeance—that individuals of great criminality, whose position places them practically above the reach of law, may be assailed as opportunity offers by the victims of their cruelty. But the general feeling that prevailed amongst the Protestants was very different, and is correctly represented by the poet in the following lines:—

"As for the Cardinal, we grant,
He was a man we well might want,
And we'll forget him soon:
And yet I think, the sooth to say,
Although the loon is well away,
The deed was foully done."

How different was the view taken of the death of Wishart among the Romanists. That death was as really a private assassination as the death of the Cardinal, for the civil authorities had interdicted the proceedings, and yet it was celebrated by the Romish party as a signal triumph of the church over her enemies,* and the Cardinal and his associates were prepared to take similar vengeance upon all who questioned the dogmas of the Church of Rome. The murder of the Cardinal, and the martyrdom of Wishart, though both meriting the severest reprehension, yet stand upon wholly different grounds: Wishart was burnt at the stake, for no delinquency, but simply for holding and proclaiming certain doctrines of religion; the Cardinal was put to death, not for any religious opinions he held at all, but for the oppressive injustice and abominable cruelty which had signalised his whole career. Both deeds were disgraceful to their perpetrators, but to place the one upon a level with the other, shows an utter disregard of all moral distinctions. The Cardinal, as a murderer, deserved to die, though his death ought not to have been effected by private hands; but Wishart, so far from having done anything worthy of death, was a man of blameless integrity, whose whole time was spent in promoting the good of others.

It has been alleged that Wishart was a party to plots for seizing the Cardinal and delivering him into the hands of Henry VIII., and that it was the knowledge of these plots which stimulated the Cardinal to bring Wishart to the stake.† The only ground for this supposition is the fact, that a person named 'Wysshert' is mentioned in the famous letter of the Earl of Hertford to the king, which speaks of a plot for seizing Beaton even at the risk of slaying him. That such a conspiracy existed is now established beyond all doubt; but that George Wishart, the martyr, was connected with it is by no means so clear. There were many persons of the name of Wishart in Scotland; and it appears highly improbable that an individual of the martyr's character and position would have been appointed by Brunston to carry his letters to the Earl of Hertford. The barons, who attended Wishart's sermons in full armour to protect him from his enemies, were not likely to send him on an errand which any of their retainers, if trustworthy, could have performed equally well. Brunston's emissary is mentioned by Hertford as 'a Scotchman called Wysshert,' terms which would scarcely have been employed to describe the preacher, who was well known both in England and Scotland, and who, two years before, had returned to his native country in the company of the commissioners sent to Henry VIII. Besides, can we imagine, that if Wishart's supposed connection with such schemes had been any part of the Cardinal's ground for proceeding against him, it would not have been brought forward at his trial? It being past all doubt that the Cardinal put five individuals to death at Perth, purely on religious grounds, there is no occasion to imagine any other reason for the treatment given to Wishart than his religious principles, and the boldness with which he maintained and propagated them. And further, the idea that Wishart was accessory to any conspiracy for the capture and possible slaughter of the Cardinal is opposed to all that we know regarding his character. But even were it clearly made out that Wishart knew and approved the scheme for surrendering the Cardinal to Henry VIII., how extravagant is it to affirm that for this he deserved to die a thousand deaths! How many thousand, then, did Beaton deserve to die, who not only plotted for the apprehension of innocent men, but actually consigned them to cruel and barbarous deaths? * When Chalmers † pronounces the assassination of Beaton "to be the foulest crime which ever stained a country, except perhaps the similar murder of Archbishop Sharp, within the same shire, in the subsequent century, by similar miscreants," one is at a loss to imagine on what principle he estimates the relative magnitude of different crimes. Certainly it is not on the common-sense principle that the innocence of a party is the greatest aggravation of injuries done to him, for Beaton's own hands were stained with blood. The dictum of this author could only be made good on the pugilistic principle, that as the conqueror of the man who has conquered others adds all his laurels to his own, so the murder of the man who has murdered others, appropriates to himself the whole guilt of his victim, and thus swells the amount of his own criminality.

For their own security, the conspirators retained possession of the castle of St. Andrew's; and a number of others who favoured the reformed opinions, betook themselves to the same place of strength, both for shelter and to aid their friends. Among these were ^{Comptroller of the Exchequer, and Governor of the town of St. Andrew's.} John Rough, who had been the Governor's chaplain for a time, and who became a preacher of the Word in St. Andrew's, and was gladly listened to both by the garrison and by the people of the town; and John Knox, who was destined to become the guiding spirit of the Reformation in Scotland, and to stamp the impress of his powerful and exalted mind, not only upon the men of his own age, but on many succeeding generations. Knox, at this time, had charge of some gentlemen's sons, and though it was his own desire to proceed to the Continent to prosecute his studies, and to escape the persecution which raged so fiercely at home, yet he was prevailed upon, a good many months after the Cardinal's death, to enter the castle, as a place where he might conduct the education of his pupils in quietness and security. His manner of teaching was very impressive. ^{Knox's study.} Both human authors and ^{as a teacher of} the Word of God he read daily along with his scholars, and he made it his object to unfold every truth fully and clearly to their minds. And he catechised them publicly, in the parish church of St. Andrew's, on the subjects they were studying, whilst not a few attended to witness the examinations and to profit by them. It soon became apparent to all who thus took the opportunity of hearing him, that he was a man eminently qualified to preach the Gospel to perishing sinners; and some of his friends proposed to him, that he should enter the pulpit and publicly proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ; but he had so high an idea of the responsibility connected with the ministerial office, that he resisted all their solicitations. It was resolved, however, by Henry Balnaves, John Rough, Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, and others, to give him a formal call to the work of the ministry; and accordingly, on a certain day, Rough presented a discourse on the subject of the appointment of ministers, dwelling upon the claims which a congregation of God's people, however small they might be, possessed to the services of those in whom they espied the gifts of God, and ^{from purely natural and not of the ministry.} pointing out the danger of turning a deaf ear to the voice of men who were desirous of being instructed in the truth. Then, turning to John Knox, who was present, he addressed him personally, saying, "Brother, you shall not be attended, when I speak to you that which I have always given from all these that are here present, ^{which is this:} In the name of God and of his Son Christ Jesus, and in the name of those that do presently call you by my mouth, I charge you that you refuse not this holy vocation, but as you tender the glory of God, the increase of Christ's kingdom, the edification of your brethren, and the comfort of us, whom you understand well enough to be over-dened, that you take upon you the public office and charge of preaching, even as you look to avoid God's heavy displeasure, and desire him to multiply his graces upon you." Then, turning to those who were present, he said, "Was not this your charge given to me, and do ye not approve this vocation?" They answered, "It was, and we approve it.*" Thus publicly called to the work of the ministry, Knox felt that he could no longer, with a clear conscience, decline accepting the office. Abashed, and bursting into tears, he withdrew to the secrecy of his own chamber. For many days together he kept aloof from society, and his countenance bore testimony to the mighty conflict which was agitating his bosom. Strengthened by this solitary communion with God, he at length presented himself in the pulpit, and thenceforth he co-operated with Rough in preaching the Gospel to all the inhabitants of the town, and also in defending the truth against the assaults of the Popish priests.

The public call given to Knox by Rough was ever regarded by him as one of the most interesting events of his life, and he viewed it as the true foundation of his right to preach the Gospel, and to discharge all the functions of the ministerial office. He had indeed been ordained a priest some years before by the authorities of the Church of Rome, but his views had undergone so great a change, and his convictions of the unscriptural character of Popery had become so strong, that he never thought for a moment of putting his early ordination upon a par with the call given to him in St. Andrew's. † He was not guilty of the absurdity chargeable upon many in our day, of maintaining, on the one hand, that the corruptions of Rome are such as to render the renunciation of her communion an imperative duty, and yet of holding, on the other, that no man can possess a valid title to preach the Gospel unless it has come to him through parties forming a chain all the way back to Rome. That it should both be a duty to forsake Rome, and yet wrong to preach unless ordination traceable up to her can be found, is a logic at which, however much it may please the advocates of a rigid Apostolical succession, common sense laughs in scorn. Either Rome is everything, or Apostolical succession is nothing. The true successors of the Apostles are those who are animated by the same spirit, who preach the same glorious truths, who manifest the same zeal in turning men from sin, and who themselves exhibit similar purity of morals and holy conversation.

Knox, in his assaults upon Popery, took higher ground than any of the opponents of Rome had ever yet ventured to do; for when Dean John Annand, at a public disputation in the parish church, was driven from all his other defences, and took refuge in the authority of the Church as an impregnable fortress, Knox argued the necessity of previously defining what the Church was, of distinguishing between the true Church of Christ and spiritual Babylon; and he declared that he no more doubted that the Roman Church was the synagogue of Satan, and its head the Pope, the Man of Sin spoken of by Paul, than he doubted that Christ had suffered by procurement of the visible Church of Jerusalem.* And he concluded with offering to prove, either by word or writing, that the present Church of Rome had degenerated further from the purity which existed in the days of the Apostles, than the Church of the Jews had done, when they consented to the death of Christ from the ordinances given by Moses.

These words produced an extraordinary sensation. They were spoken publicly in the church, in the presence of a large assemblage of people, and the desire was awakened in every mind to hear what could be advanced in support of an affirmation so subversive of all that had hitherto been most firmly believed. "If this be true," said they, "we have been miserably deceived."

On the following Sabbath-day, accordingly, Knox did preach to a crowded audience, in the parish church of St. Andrew's, on the subject of Popery.

Instead of wasting his strength upon the smaller points at issue between the Church of Rome and the Protestants, he took for his theme the 24th and 25th verses of the VIIth chapter of Daniel, and, after pointing out the correspondence between the four great monarchies of ancient times and the four beasts seen in vision by the prophet, he boldly maintained that the Roman hierarchy was the wicked blaspheming power spoken of in connection with the fourth beast, which denoted the Roman empire. It was this same power which was referred to in the New Testament, when mention was made of the apostasy, the Man of Sin, the Antichrist, the whore of Babylon. All the marks of opposition to God pointed out by Daniel and by the Apostles were to be found in the Papal system, and in no other that ever existed. Antichrist was not to be understood as denoting a single person, but a body and multitude of people, having a wicked head, which proved the occasion of wickedness to all under his authority. The true ground of the designation was contrariety to Christ in life, in doctrines, and in laws; and this contrariety in all its parts, he maintained, was to be found in the Church of Rome. Her contrariety in respect of life appeared in the gross immorality and licentiousness which had notoriously prevailed, both amongst the Popes themselves and amongst all orders of the clergy. Her contrariety in respect of doctrine was made good by comparing the scriptural principle of justification by faith with the Romish dogma of justification by works, and pilgrimages, and penances, and priestly absolutions. Her contrariety in regard to laws was established by a reference to church holidays, enforced abstinence from meats, and prohibition of marriage, which had been left free by Christ to all men, and which even the Apostles themselves had entered into. One mark of the beast indicated by the prophet was, that he was to speak great words against the Most High. But what more presumptuous things could be imagined than were spoken by the Pope, who called himself Christ's vicar upon earth, the successor of Peter, the head of the Church, most holy, most blessed; who maintained that he could not err; that he could make right wrong, and wrong right; that out of nothing he could make something; that he had all truth enclosed in the shrine of his own breast; that he had power over all, and none had any power over him, even to say he did wrong, though he drew millions of souls with him to hell. If these titles and pretensions, which are contained in his own canon law, be not great and blasphemous words, and such as mortal man never spake before, let the world judge. Another feature of the predicted apostasy was adduced from the Apocalypse of John, who says that the great whore was to make merchandise of the souls of men, and such merchandise it was affirmed was made by the Pope and his clergy. For did they not take upon them to mitigate the pains said to be endured in purgatory, and to release souls from thence by means of masses sold for money to surviving friends? And also did they not make merchandise of pardons and indulgences, which no other church had ever had the hardihood to do? And in the conclusion of his discourse he declared that if any person present—and there were present many canons, and friars of both Orders, and the sub-prior, John Winram—would affirm that he had cited scripture, or any human author or standard, unfairly, he would exhibit the original documents before competent witnesses, and not only point out the passages complained of, but demonstrate that their meaning was what he had alleged it to be.*

This discourse, which was the first Knox preached in public, produced an extraordinary impression upon the minds of men. It shook the confidence of multitudes in the authority and character of the Church of Rome, and it led not a few to forsake her communion altogether. "Others (it was said) had hewed at the branches of Popery, but Knox struck at the root, to bring down the whole tree." "Let the doctors and masters now defend the Pope and his authority, so manifestly impugned in their own presence." Some said Wishart never spoke so plainly, and yet he was burned, and so shall this man. Others said the tyranny of the Cardinal made not his cause the better, nor the suffering of Wishart his cause the worse; and therefore the priests and bishops must now provide better defenders than fire and sword, otherwise they shall be disappointed, for men are looking with different eyes than in former days.

The adherents of Rome felt the need of doing something to stem the tide of opposition that was setting in so strongly against their system; and the new Measure adopted against Knox and Rough. Archbishop of St. Andrew's, John Hamilton, brother of the Governor, although not yet consecrated, wrote to the sub-prior, Dean John Winram, expressing astonishment that he suffered such heretical and schismatical doctrines to be taught without opposition. Thus called upon by the voice of authority, the sub-prior, and a convention of Black and Grey Friars, drew up a number of articles, gathered out of Knox's discourse, and summoned Rough and him to appear before them, to answer for sentiments so strange and so subversive of all the principles held by the Church. The propositions complained of, as maintained by Knox, were the following:—

1. That no mortal man can be head of the Church.
2. That the Pope is Antichrist, and therefore is no member of Christ's mystical body.
3. That man neither can make nor devise a religion acceptable to God, but is bound to observe and keep the religion received from God, without chopping or changing it.
4. That the sacraments of the New Testament ought to be administered as they were instituted by Christ, and observed by the Apostles, nothing being added to them, and nothing taken away from them.
5. That the mass is abominable idolatry, blasphemous to the death of Christ, and a profanation of the Lord's Supper.
6. That there is no purgatory in which the souls of men can either be paid or purged after this life; but heaven awaits the faithful, and hell is the portion of the reprobate and unfaithful.
7. That praying for the dead is vain, and praying to them is idolatry.
8. That there are no bishops excepting those who preach themselves, and not by substitute.
9. That by God's law tithes do not bring of necessity to churchmen.*

In the disputation which ensued upon these articles, the sub-prior, whose leanings already were manifestly towards the reformed opinions, conducted himself with great moderation. When Knox said that he had long since heard he was not ignorant of the truth, and appealed to his conscience, as in the sight of the Supreme Judge, that, if he believed the doctrines expressed in the articles to be true, he ought openly to declare his mind, for the satisfaction and good of the people, who looked to him as an authority, he replied—"I come not here as a judge, but only familiarly to converse, and therefore I will neither approve nor condemn; but, if you choose, I will reason." The sub-prior then spoke of the power of the Church to appoint decent ceremonies, and instanced the band in baptism as significant of the roughness of the law, and the oil as significant of God's mercy. But Knox argued that if you might invent ceremonies, and give them a signification at your pleasure, then the ceremonies of the Gentiles, and those of the Mahometans, might all be adopted, if you only took care to give them some plausible interpretation. The only safe rule was to take Scripture for a guide, and to introduce no rites into the Church but such as were sanctioned by God himself. When the sub-prior alleged that many things might be done without the express authority of Scripture—such as asking drink when thirsty—Knox besought him not to jest in so grave a matter, and reminded him that there was a liberty expressly allowed in the New Testament as to meats and drinks, while there was no such liberty conceded in respect of religious observances; but, on the contrary, the command was to add nothing to them, and to take nothing from them.

* Knox's History of the Reformation, vol. i. pp. 192, 194.

One Arbuckle, a Grey Friar, then attempted to prove the divine authority of the ceremonies instituted by the Church from the text of Paul, where he speaks of building gold and silver and precious stones, wood and hay and stubble, upon Christ the foundation; affirming that the gold and silver and precious stones were the ceremonies of the Church, which she had built upon Christ, according to the express authority of the Apostle. But Knox met his argument by requesting to know what fire it was that the ceremonies of the Church, like gold and silver and precious stones, were able to abide? If it was the Word of God that was the fire, then it was obvious that as we are commanded not to add to this Word, nor to take anything from it, the ceremonies of the Church stood condemned as a human addition to the institutions of God. They could abide the trial of the Word only, as the thief abides the trial of law, and is condemned to be hanged. The friar, somewhat at a loss for an answer to the keen logic of his opponent, and trying to prove that we are not so closely bound to the Word as Knox supposed, affirmed that the Apostles had not received the Holy Ghost when they wrote their epistles, and that it was after they were inspired that they instituted the ceremonies of the Church. This foolish answer, while it drew from Knox the sarcastic exclamation, "If that be true, I have been long in error, and I think I shall die in my error," led to the immediate interference of the sub-prior, who cried out, "God forbid that you make such an affirmation as that, for then farewell to the ground of our faith." The friar now betook himself in confusion to the authority of the Church as a safe and impregnable fortress; and when Knox argued that the spouse of Christ could have no power or authority against the Word of God, the friar cried out, "Then ye will leave us no Church at all." Knox replied with keen irony that there was a Church mentioned in the Book of Psalms (xxvi. 5), ecclesiam malignantium—the congregation of evil-doers—which they might have without the Word of God, if they were so disposed; but as for him he would abide by that Church which had Christ Jesus for its great pastor, and whose leading characteristic was to hear his voice, and to turn away from the voice of strangers. After some other matters were briefly considered, the conference was brought to a close, and Knox and Rough were dismissed, simply with an admonition to take heed what doctrine they delivered in public.*

The clergy, perceiving that public discussion only tended to give wider circulation to the views of their opponents, refrained from any further conference with the Reformers; and, having consulted regarding the best means of putting a stop to defection from the Church, they resolved that all the learned men of the Abbey and University should preach in the parish church on the Lord's-days, according to seniority, avoiding all controverted points that would furnish occasion for talk among the people. By this means, not only did they appear to be returning to a sense of their duty as public instructors, but Knox also was excluded from the pulpit, for which hitherto there had been none to compete with him. On the week-days, however, he continued to preach, and his enemies were restrained from molesting him by fear of those who held the castle.

The labours of Knox during his stay at St. Andrew's were the means of turning many from the errors of Popery; and a considerable number, both in the castle and in the town, were awakened to a sense of their sins, embraced Christ as the Saviour, and made an open profession of faith in him. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was publicly dispensed, free from all Popish mummeries, and in accordance with the method which has prevailed ever since in the Reformed Church.† These proceedings at St. Andrew's filled the adherents of the Church of Rome with rage; the priests and bishops ran to the Governor and to the Queen with the bitter complaint—"What are you doing? will you suffer this whole realm to be infected with pernicious doctrine?" A formal supplication was presented to the Governor and Lords of the Great Council, by bishops, prelates, and kirkmen, to the effect that it was not unknown to his Grace and their lordships that sundry parts of this realm, which had been Catholic from the beginning of the faith till these days, were now infected with the pestilential heresies of Luther; that many persons were openly preaching and instructing others in the said damnable doctrines, not in secluded places merely, but in the centre of the kingdom, and near the court; and that unless some remedy were applied, and the aid of the temporal power afforded to the spiritual jurisdiction, the evil would increase and extend from day to day, until it became so great as to baffle remedy. Therefore, it was humbly craved that speedy help and remedy might be given, which would be well pleasing to God, and conduce to the maintenance of the Christian faith, and the honour of his Grace and their lordships. To this application a favourable answer was returned by the Governor, and promise was given that the laws of the realm should be executed on all whom the bishops proved to be guilty of heresy.*

At the same time, renewed efforts were made to obtain possession of the castle of St. Andrew's, and those who held it were summoned to surrender. A promise had been given to them long before this of a full and free pardon of all past offences, on condition of a voluntary submission; but when the deed of absolution arrived from Rome, it contained the clause, remittimus crimen irremissibile—we pardon a crime which cannot be pardoned—which was justly considered as not securing the safety of those who had been concerned in the Cardinal's death. The surrender of the castle was therefore still refused; but the Governor having procured a fleet of galleys and a considerable body of troops

Castle of St. Andrew's surrendered. from France, was enabled to prosecute the siege with vigour; and at length, after various successes and reverses on both sides, the garrison agreed to surrender the castle on condition the lives of all who were in it, whether English or Scots, were to be spared, and that they were to be safely transported to France, and either allowed to remain there in freedom, or to be sent, at the expense of the King of France, to any other country they pleased, Scotland only excepted.† Great joy prevailed among the adherents of Rome in consequence of the recovery of St. Andrew's. The castle was ordered, by an Act of Council, to be razed to the ground, either as having been the scene of a Cardinal's assassination, or through fear that it might fall into the hands of the English. But this order seems to have been only partially executed. ‡

After the surrender of the castle, on the 31st July, 1547, on the conditions above specified, Knox and all his friends were carried into France, and, contrary to one of the express stipulations of the treaty made in St. Andrew's, they were confined—some in

Treatment of the captives in France. prisons, and others in galleys, and treated with the utmost rigour. They were subjected to great indignities, and endured much suffering, till the war was terminated, by the treaty of Boulogne, in 1550. Constant efforts were made to shake their principles, to induce them to attend mass, to kiss images of the Virgin Mary, or to comply with some other Popish rite. Henry Balnaves was confined in the castle of Rouen, and, being a very learned man, he had many conflicts with accomplished and skilful opponents, who were sent to shake his faith, and to bring him over, if possible, to the Church of Rome; but he repelled with energy and acuteness every assault that was made upon him, and remained true to his principles. In prison, he wrote a work on Justification, which Knox characterises as a most profitable treatise, and which was afterwards published at Edinburgh, in 1584. Knox was among those prisoners who were confined in the galleys. He mentions that many threats were employed to compel him and his associates to adore the mass, but that not one of them ever paid the reverence that was demanded. They followed, says he, the instructions which were given by God to the Israelites in Babylon, that when they should see the Babylonians worship gods of gold and silver, and metal and wood, they were not to copy their example, but were to say, "The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth, even they shall perish from the earth and from under these heavens." (Jeremiah x. 11.) When songs of praise were sung to the Virgin, the Scotchmen persisted in keeping on their bonnets and caps, and obstinately refused to kiss the painted image of Our Lady. The effort to coerce them was at length given up, after the following occurrence, which Knox calls a merry fact:—While on the Loire, at Nantes, a painted Lady was brought forward to be kissed, and when presented to one of the Scotchmen, who there can be little doubt was Knox himself, he said—"Trouble me not, such an idol is accused; I will not touch it." The two officers who had charge of it said that he must handle it, and violently thrust it into his face, and put it between his hands. Knox, in this extremity, took hold of the idol, and, watching for a fit opportunity, threw it overboard into the river, saying, "Let Our Lady swim over herself: she is light enough, let her learn to swim." Balfour and Knox were in the same galley, and sailing at one time along the bay between Harlow and St. Andrew's, Knox being exceedingly unwell, Balfour asked him if he recognised the spot. "Yes, I know it very well, for I see the steeples of that place where God first in public opened my mouth to His glory, and I am fully persuaded, how soon soever I now appear, that I shall not depart this life till my tongue shall glorify His name in the same place." Nor was the piety of Knox undervalued even under the dress of a galley-slave, for the master of the galley, though a Papist, was in the habit, when storm and tempest threatened, of asking him to commend him and his galley to God in his prayers; and he was glad of his deliverance, because he thought he never had good success, on account of his keeping that holy man in slavery. †

From the time of the surrender of the castle of St. Andrew's till 1550, when peace was concluded at Boulogne, the attention of the Court and the Scottish people was engrossed with promoting the comparative advantages of the proposals of England and those of France for the hand of the infant queen, with the struggles of contending factions in reference to this question, and the ruinous war with England into which they plunged the country. No sooner was peace restored, than the clergy began to take measures for kind-ling anew the flames of religious strife and persecution. That liberty of profession, which had now been enjoyed for several years, must come to an end. The fruits of the triumph which had been gained in securing possession of St. Andrew's must be reaped.

Relieved of the presence of Knox, whose burning eloquence had such an irresistible power over the whole community, and whose spirit it was impossible to tame, the priesthood determined to take prompt and effective measures for the extirpation of heresy. Justice courts were held by the Governor at the instigation of his brother, the bishop, in various parts of the country, which proved a vast annoyance to the people, and involved in ruin not a few individuals favourable to the new opinions. It was at this time the martyrdom of Adam Wallace, tutor to the family of Lady Ormiston, took place. He was brought to trial at Edinburgh in presence of the Governor, the Earl of Argyle, great Justiciar of the realm, the Earls of Angus, Huntly, and Glencairn, with many bishops and abbots, and charged with usurping the office of the Adam Wallace. Christian ministry without a lawful call—with baptizing one of his own children—with denying the existence of purgatory—with maintaining that prayers addressed to departed saints or for persons deceased were altogether superstitious—with styling the mass an idolatrous service, and affirming that the bread and wine in the sacrament of the altar remained, even after the words of consecration, nothing but bread and wine. Though not a man of much learning or ability, he conducted his defence with firmness and propriety, made a fearless profession of the truth as it is in Christ, and declared that he could hold no doctrines but such as were proved to him out of the Word of God. He had a Bible fastened to his belt in French, and Dutch, and English; and when the accuser endeavoured to convict him of heresy as diverging from the doctrines of the Church, he invariably brought the question to the test of Scripture as the only authority entitled to regulate his faith. When asked whether the bread and wine were not the very body of Christ—flesh, blood, and bones—he replied, that the body of Christ was in heaven, and would continue at the right hand of the Father till he came to judge the quick and the dead; and that the words in John's Gospel, "Except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood, ye have no life in you," were to be interpreted on the principle laid down by our Lord himself in that very chapter: "It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." "It is an horrible heresy!" exclaimed the Bishop of Orkney.

When the trial was drawing to a close, he addressed the Governor and the other lords in these solemn and affecting words: "If you condemn me for holding by God's Word, my innocent blood shall be required at your hands when you shall be brought before the judgment-seat of Christ, who is mighty to defend my innocent cause, before whom you shall not deny it, nor yet be able to resist his wrath, to whom I refer the vengeance; as it is written, 'Vengeance is mine, and I will repay it.'"^{*} Notwithstanding this solemn appeal to his judges, he was pronounced guilty of heresy, and condemned to the flames; and the sentence was carried into execution, on the following day, on the Castle Hill. † During the night he was confined with irons about his legs and neck, and various persons were sent to him to endeavour to shake his faith; but nothing could drive him from his trust in God, and from the doctrines which he believed to be grounded on Scripture. His Bible, which had been his constant companion wherever he went, was taken from him; but as he had the Psalms of David stored up in his memory, he was able to sing the praise of God, to his great consolation. Certain other books, also, which he had with him to sustain and comfort his soul in this trying season, were forced out of his possession; but no provocation could exhaust his patience, or shake the hope which he had in God through Christ. When morning came, renewed attempts were made to induce him to recant, Wallace burned but he was firm as a rock, which upon the Castle Hill.

so provoked Sir Hugh Terry, that, in a rage, he declared he would make the devils come out of him before night. The only reply of the innocent sufferer to these unfeeling words was, "You should be a godly man, and rather give me consolation in my trying case." On his way to the Castle Hill, he was followed by a numerous crowd, many of whom were moved with sympathy, and were heard to say, "God have mercy upon him." Before he entered the fire he lifted his eyes in prayer to heaven, and then began to address the people, "Let it not offend you that I suffer death this day for the truth's sake, for the disciple is not above his master;" but he was prevented from giving further expression to his feelings; and the fire being kindled he commended his soul to God, and met his death of torture with unshaken constancy and firm trust in the promises of that Book which had ever been so dear to his heart.*

About this time a controversy broke out among the Romish clergy, which may be mentioned as an illustration of the almost incredible ignorance which prevailed among them. Richard Marshall, prior of the Black Friars at Newcastle, having taught in a sermon at St. Andrew's, in opposition to a practice sanctioned by many of the clergy, that the Pater Noster should be said to God only, and not to the saints; great offence was taken at this self-evident truth, and attempts were made to prove that the Lord's prayer, in all its petitions, might be addressed to the saints; for, said Friar Tottis, if you meet an old man in the street, you will say to him, 'Good morrow, father;' and why may you not call a departed saint your father? and as the saints are in heaven, why may you not say to any one of them, 'Our Father, which art in heaven?' and as God has made their names holy, why may you not address them in this manner, 'Hallowed be thy name?' The kingdom of God, too, is their's, as being possessed and enjoyed by them, and their will differs in no respect from the will of God: therefore, in praying to them, you may employ the language, 'Thy kingdom come: thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven.' More difficulty was found in showing the applicability to the saints of the petition regarding daily bread; but the ingenious friar was not to be baffled; for, quoth he, the saints pray for us that we may get our daily bread, and thus in some sort we are indebted to them for the supplies we receive from time to time.

This discourse of the friar excited the ridicule of all who were able to comprehend what the words Pater Noster meant; and the very craftsmen and servants at St. Andrew's applied to the preacher the nick-name of Friar Pater Noster. Pasquils were also affixed to the Abbey Church in ridicule of the doctors of theology of fourscore years, who, though calling one another Rabbi and Magister Noster, yet knew not to whom to say their Pater Noster. For the settlement of this profound theological question, it was found necessary, in order to avoid greater inconveniences, to convene various meetings of the clergy. Some maintained that the Pater Noster should be said to God formaliter, and to the saints materialiter; others, that it should be said to God principaliter, and to the saints minus principaliter; and others still, that it should be said to God capiendo stricte, and to the saints capiendo large.

While this weighty matter was under debate, the servant of the sub-prior asked him one night, on his return home, what business was on hand, and being answered, "We cannot agree to whom the Pater Noster should be said," he replied, "Sir, to whom should it be said but unto God?" "But what," rejoined the sub-prior, "are we to do with the saints?" "Give them eyes and words even in the devil's name, for that may suffice them." For the farther consideration of this heavy question a provincial council was held at Edinburgh, in which there seemed to be a majority favourable to the idea, that the saints might have the Pater Noster addressed to them; but as several Melancholians refused to subscribe such a decree, it was at length agreed to entrust the matter to the sub-prior of St. Andrew's, who, on his return home, should declare to the people how the Pater Noster was to be said, yet so as not to deny that the saints might in some way to be invoked.*

In this council, and another which was held at Linlithgow in the following year, various measures were adopted for re-forming glaring abuses and transgressions, with a view of putting a stop to defection from the church. It was appointed that an English translation should be published, containing a short explanation of the Commandments, Creed, Lord's Prayer, Magnificat, and Ave Maria; and the curates were enjoined to read a portion of it to the people every Sunday and holiday when there was no sermon. This was generally known by the name of the "Tempting Faith," from the price at which it was sold, yet it was a work of some size, and competent judges have pronounced it to be a work of considerable merit. But it never passed into general circulation among the people; for Lord Hailes observes, that the Council which authorised it, used as many precautions to prevent it from coming into the hands of the laity, as if it had been a book replete with the most pestilential heresy.† In the year 1640, at Linlithgow, all opinions opposed to those of the Church of Rome were condemned, and the maintainers of them declared liable to severe and perpetual punishment; and the decrees of the Council of Trent, made in the time of Pope Pius III., were received.

Acts were also passed for the reformation of immoralities prevalent among the clergy, but Archbishop Spottiswood says they were hardly productive of any benefit; for the parties concerned with the execution of them were often the very parties who were themselves most deeply implicated.‡ Bishop Leslie, however, is of opinion that a considerable amount of good was effected by them.

Meanwhile, the reformed opinions were not making any apparent progress. They were thrown out of public view into the recesses of libraries and the closets of individuals. There was held them were at the mercy of their curators, and they could only sigh in secret over the obstructions that were done in the land, and pray for the advent of more propitious times. Yet we cannot doubt that the seed sown by Knox and Brough was germinating in not a few hearts, and that a real progress was going on during this time of apparent inaction. The suspension of visible growth in winter is as needful to the subsequent harvest as are the shooting blades and bursting buds of spring. During the dark season of the year juices are elaborated, and unseen processes are carried on, which prepare the way for the visible changes that delight the eye in spring and summer. So, although nothing was openly done at this time to advance the principles of the Reformation, yet the people had time to meditate in the retirement of their houses upon the principles which they had heard from the lips of faithful preachers; and they were thus prepared for giving more attentive heed to the truths of the Gospel, and deriving greater benefit from them, when another opportunity should, in the good providence of God, be afforded for the public preaching of the Word. There is an ebb and a flow in all human affairs. Reverses follow times of prosperity, and reverses are often the means of eliciting greater energy and securing greater prosperity afterwards. From the days of Stephen downwards, the history of the church has exhibited persecutions and trials made subservient to the wider extension and firmer establishment of the truth. Out of the fire of affliction the people of God have come, like gold, purified and refined.

The next event that exerted an influence upon the state of religion in Scotland, was the accession of Mary to the English throne at the death of Edward VI., in 1553.

Effect of the death of Edward VI. on the state of religion. Her principles being altogether different from those of her predecessor, she very speedily overthrew the order of things which had been established by him, and raised so fierce a persecution against all who refused to submit to the authority of the Romish Church, that she has come to be known by the name of "the bloody Mary." It was in this persecution that John Rough, colleague of Knox at St. Andrew's, suffered martyrdom. Being obliged to visit London for articles requisite to the trade by which he supported his wife and family, he was apprehended, and brought to trial before Bishop Bonner, on the charges of being a married priest, refusing to use the Latin service, and absenting himself from mass; and having defended his conduct in all these respects, he was condemned to die, and was accordingly burned at Smithfield on the 21st November, 1557.*

One effect of the severe measures adopted during Mary's persecuting reign, was to drive the most faithful ministers into neighbouring countries. Some of them came to Scotland, and were the means of fanning anew the flame of religious zeal when it seemed threatened with extinction.

Ministers driven from England spread the truth in Scotland. Among these messengers of truth thus sent in providence, may be mentioned William Harlow, a plain, simple man, by birth a Scotchman, who had served some years with approbation in the English Church, and John Willock, a man of greater ability and learning, who had formerly been a Franciscan friar in the town of Ayr. On leaving England he had fled into Friesland, where he practised medicine for some time; and thereafter he was sent by the Countess of Friesland with a commission of some kind to the Queen-regent of Scotland. This commission naturally gave him some liberty of speech and action; and he availed himself of the opportunity of sowing the seeds of religious truth. Both he and Harlow* were visited by many of the friends of the Gospel, and by not a few persons of distinction; and the faithful instructions which they imparted, enforced by the sufferings which they were enduring for the sake of Christ, had no small influence in extending the knowledge of the pure doctrines of the Gospel, and in confirming those who had already embraced them. Thus, as in the case of the persecution that arose at the death of the first martyr, good sprang from evil: the blast of persecution scattered more widely the seeds of evangelical truth. At this time there was a regular meeting of the friends of the Gospel in Edinburgh, held in the fields in summer, and in houses in winter. Harlow and Willock were their teachers, and sometimes also Paul Methven, John Douglas, and the laird of Dun. At first there were two small societies, but they were joined into one body through the influence of the laird of Dun; and their numbers increased from day to day. They had elders and deacons set apart for the management of their affairs, whose names are not unworthy of being mentioned, they were George Small, Michael Christison, James Gray, Adam Craig, John Cairns; and the office of reader was held by Alexander Hope.† This association, gathered together in such troublous times, and moulded into shape and form under the pressure of adversity, maintained its existence unbroken, and in the end became a great body. It was the acorn from which grew the oak of the religious privileges of Scotland. It was the nucleus of what was afterwards called the Congregation, which exerted so mighty an influence upon the institutions of the whole kingdom: a striking instance of the truth of the scriptural principle that God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and base things of the world and things which are despised hath God chosen: yea, and things which are not to bring to nought things that are, that no flesh should glory in his presence.

But the event which produced the most powerful effect upon the state of religion in Scotland was the return of John Knox, towards the close of the year 1555. After his deliverance from the galleys in 1550, he had spent some time in England, where he refused the bishopric of Rochester, on account of his dislike of vrelacy. He had then proceeded to Frankfurt.

where he ministered for some time to the English church in that place; but keen controversies arising about the order and form of worship, he had left Frankfort, and gone to reside in Geneva. And now there being nothing to detain him upon the continent, he felt that it was his duty to venture back among his own countrymen; though his enemies at home occupied all the seats of power, and he knew they would not scruple to employ every possible means for his annoyance and destruction. His return was hailed with gladness and delight by all the friends of evangelical truth; and it gave a new impulse to the progress of the cause for which he had already done so much.

Knox resumed his labours at Edinburgh, where his private exhortations were attended by considerable numbers. His great object was to unfold the pure doctrines of the Gospel; to display the fulness and freeness of God's mercy in Christ; to exhibit the Son of God as the only mediator between heaven and earth; and his preaching brought peace and comfort to many who had been sorely distressed by the consciousness of sin. Finding that some who made a profession of the truth were in the Knox's exposure of the evil of the mass. habit of attending mass, not because they valued it, but through fear of danger, and that they regarded Paul's payment of a vow in the temple as warranting their conformity, he exposed the idolatrous character of the popish sacrament, and showed that the Apostle's conduct was not a parallel case at all.* His arguments on this topic produced a deep impression on some men of high standing, such as Maitland of Lethington, who candidly acknowledged that Knox was right, and said, "I see perfectly that these shifts will serve for nothing before God, seeing they stand us in so small stead before men." Through these efforts of the Reformer, the mass fell into utter discredit among the friends of truth, and was shunned as an idolatrous rite.

From Edinburgh Knox proceeded to various parts of the country, Angus and Mearns, Lanark and Ayrshire, preaching the Gospel both publicly and privately to multitudes of all ranks, and dispensing the Lord's Supper, according to the purity and simplicity of Scripture. He went from place to place, at the invitation of different friends of the Reformation, and was successively the guest of Erskine of Dun, Sandilands of Calder, Campbell of Kinzeanleugh, the Earl of Glencairn, and others. Immense benefit accrued to the cause of truth from this preaching tour. The friends of the Gospel were instructed and encouraged, and their numbers were considerably augmented. And they were led to the determination to renounce all connection with idolatry, and to maintain to the uttermost the preaching of the Gospel, as God should give them preachers and opportunity.†

and, above all, the fact, that many now began to absent themselves from the mass as an idolatrous service, filled the priesthood with alarm and indignation. It seemed necessary to take vigorous measures in order to arrest the growing defection; and accordingly the bishops summoned the preacher to appear before them in the church of the Black Friars at Edinburgh, on the 13th May, 1556, to answer for the heretical principles which he was spreading throughout the kingdom. With that fearless intrepidity which never quailed before danger or difficulty, Knox at once determined to appear at the bar of his enemies to defend his cause; but when the day came, not his strength, but theirs, failed. Though he was upon the spot, and ready to answer his accusers, they were afraid to proceed with the trial, and they deserted the diet on the ground of some alleged informality in the summons. But the true reason was, that public sympathy was strongly excited in favour of the Reformer; and a number of barons and men of rank had come from the country for the very purpose of encouraging him by their presence, and defending him, if necessary, from the malversations of his unscrupulous enemies. In these circumstances, a trial could not answer the purposes of the priesthood, and therefore the idea of it was abandoned.

The abortive effort thus made by the clergy to arrest the Reformer's career, only aroused him to greater activity and zeal, and he preached with more publicity and fervour, and was attended by greater multitudes than ever. The Marquis of Glencairn and Marischal were among his daily hearers, and they were so struck with the clear and convincing exhibitions he gave of Christian truth, that they imagined the Queen-regent would hardly be able to resist his eloquence; and therefore they prevailed upon him to write a letter to her, in the hope that she might be induced to show some favour to the cause of the Reformation. This letter, which is contained in 'Calderwood's History,' is written with great power and faithfulness; but it was treated with contempt by the party to whom it was sent, and ridiculed as a paucity.

In this letter, after showing from Scripture that the victory of the saints was achieved through suffering and sorrow, Knox draws the attention of the Queen-regent to the persecutions which were everywhere directed by the Romish Church against all who differed from her. He adverts to the accusations and slanders which were spread against himself, and which he knows not had come to her ears; and he shows God that, by the dew of his grace he had so quenched the fire of displeasure in her Grace's heart, that the pains formed against him had hitherto been fruitless. He brings into view the evil done by Popery to the souls of men, by withholding from them the Word of Life, and teaching them painful doctrines. "I know," he continues, "you will wonder how the religion which is universally received can be so damnable and corrupted. But if your Grace will consider, that from the beginning the multitude have declined from God, yea, even among the people to whom he spake by his law and his prophets: if you consider the complaint of the Holy Ghost, complaining that nations, people, princes, and kings of the earth, have raged against the Lord and his Anointed: further, if you consider the question which Christ himself moves in these words, 'When the Son of man shall come, shall he find faith upon the earth?' and lastly, if your Grace consider the manifest contempt of God, and of his holy precepts, which this day reigneth without punishment upon the face of the whole earth—if deeply, I say, your Grace contemplate the universal corruption that reigneth in all estates; then shall your Grace cease to wonder that many are called and few chosen; and you shall begin to tremble and fear to follow the multitude to perdition. The universal defection, whereof St Paul prophesied, is easily to be espied as well in religion as in manners. The corruption of life is evident; and religion is not judged nor measured by the plain Word of God, but by custom, consuetude, will, consent, and determinations of men. But shall he who hath pronounced all the cogitations of man's heart to be vain, accept the counsels and consents of men for a religion acceptable and pleasing before him? Let not your Grace be deceived: God hath witnessed from the beginning that no religion pleaseth him, except that which he by his own word hath commanded—'In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.' Before the coming of his Son, God punished all who altered his ceremonies and statutes; and will he now, after he hath opened his counsel to the world by Christ, admit men's inventions in the matter of religion? Were an angel to say so, God's Word would convict him of falsehood: 'Not that which seemeth good to thine eyes shalt thou do to the Lord, but that which the Lord hath commanded thee, that do thou. Add nothing to it, diminish nothing from it.' God's messenger might now require of your Grace a motherly pity upon your subjects, justice against murderers and oppressors, a heart void of partiality, with the rest of the virtues required in God's rulers. But vain it is to crave reformation of manners where religion is corrupted; for like as a man cannot do the office of a man till first he have a being and life, so to work works pleasant in the sight of God the Father, can no man do without the Spirit of the Lord Jesus, which doth not abide in the hearts of idolators. God, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, move your heart to consider these things. To him I unfeignedly commit your Grace."

In consequence of an earnest solicitation from the church in Geneva, Knox, though warmly entreated by his friends to remain in Scotland, proceeded thither in July, 1556. Scarcely had he departed when a new summons was issued, requiring him to appear before the clergy and, for non-appearance, he was condemned as a heretic, and his effigy was burned at the market-cross of Edinburgh. The sentence having been transmitted to him, he wrote an answer to it, styled, "An appellation from the Clergy to the Nobility and Commons of Scotland," which is full of eloquent appeals and most convincing arguments, and which must have helped forward the cause of reform, as much as if he had been personally present labouring with all his wonted zeal.

In this appeal he shows, from the cases of Jeremiah and Paul, that he had a right, when his life was threatened by men calling themselves the spiritual power, to seek the protection of the temporal authorities—"If you be powers ordained by God, then is the sword given unto you for maintenance of the innocent, and punishment of malefactors. But I and my brethren do offer not only to prove ourselves innocent in all things laid to our charge, but also to show most evidently that your bishops are the very pestilence who have infected all Christianity. The words of the Apostolic teach how far the higher powers are bound to their subjects—to wit, that because they are God's ministers, by him ordained for the profit and utility of others, most diligently ought they to attend upon the same; and this is the reason why subjects are commanded to pay tribute, 'for this do ye pay tribute and toll.' Whence it is plain that there is no honour without a charge annexed. And this I wish your wisdoms deeply to consider, that God hath not placed you above your brethren to reign as tyrants, without regard to their profit and commodity. You hear the Holy Ghost witness the contrary, that all lawful powers are God's ministers, ordained for the wealth, profit, and salvation of their subjects, and not for their destruction. Could it be said, I beseech you, that magistrates enclosing their subjects in a city without victuals, or giving them only such as were poisoned, did rule for their profit? Now, if the soul be greater and more precious than the body, we may easily espy how unworthy of authority those be, who debar their subjects from hearing of God's Word, and by fire and sword compel them to feed upon the damnable doctrine of Antichrist. It is not enough that you abstain from violent wrong and oppression: you are bound to rule for the public good, which you cannot do, if, by your maintenance of ravening wolves, you suffer men's souls to perish for lack of the true food, which is Christ's evangel sincerely preached. It will not excuse you to say that you supposed the charge of souls committed to your bishops; for if your bishops be proved to be no bishops, but ravening wolves, which I offer to prove by God's Word, by law and councils, by the judgment of all the godly learned from the primitive church to this day: then must your permission and defence of them be reputed before God a participation in their theft and murder. I am not ignorant what be the vain defences of your proud prelates. They claim a prerogative and privilege that they are exempted, and that by consent of councils and emperors, from all jurisdiction of the temporal power. But from what fountain did this their immunity spring? When the bishops of Rome had, partly by fraud, and partly by violence, usurped the superiority of some places in Italy, then began Pope after Pope to devise how they might be exempted from the judgment of princes and the equity of laws. In this point they were most vigilant, till at length iniquity so prevailed, that this sentence was pronounced—that 'neither by the emperor, neither by the clergy, nor yet by the people, shall the judge be judged; for, saith Agatho, all the precepts of the apostolic seat are assured as by the voice of God himself.' This immunity being established for the head, then began provision to be made for the members; and the fruit is, that none of the papistical order will be subject to civil magistrates, how enormous soever his crime, but must be tried by his own ordinary. This is just as if thieves, and murderers, and brigands, should conspire among themselves never to answer before a lawful magistrate, to the end that theft and murder should not be punished. Thus, my lords, I have declared what God requireth of you as rulers and princes. I have offered unto you, and to the inhabitants of the realm, the verity of Christ Jesus; and, with the hazard of my life, I offer to prove the religion which is maintained amongst you by fire and sword, to be false, damnable, and diabolical. Which things if you refuse, maintaining tyrants in their tyranny, then I dare not flatter, but must with Ezekiel proclaim to you, that you shall perish in your iniquity; and in the day of Christ's apparition be driven from his presence. May God, by the power of his Spirit, rule and dispose your hearts to consider these things with simplicity.*

It is recorded that many prodigies and signs were observed about this time;—a remarkable comet, which shone for three months; rivers dried up in winter, and swoln so high in summer that villages were flooded, and many cattle swept away into the sea; whales of immense size thrown ashore in various parts of the Forth; hailstones of the size of pigeons' eggs, which destroyed much corn; and a fiery dragon, which was seen to fly along the earth, vomiting forth fire, and rendering it necessary to watch houses and corn-yards. These signs were very generally regarded as portending great changes, particularly in the state of the Church. Doubtless this interpretation had no other ground than the fancies and feelings of the people; but still it is worthy of notice, as indicating a wide-spread defection from the Church, and a general anticipation of change. And certain it is that the estimation and influence of the Romish clergy began now rapidly to decline. Not a few of their number became converts to the new opinions, and, relinquishing their ecclesiastical position, made an open profession of evangelical truth, and laboured to advance it. In all parts of the country numbers of the clerical body, both secular and regular, but especially of the latter, espoused the cause of the Reformation; and, speaking as eye-witnesses of what they condemned, they gave a mighty impulse to the progress of Gospel truth.*

This state of affairs was highly encouraging to the friends of reformation, and justly encouraging that the presence of Knox would be of equal service to the cause, they determined to write him back. On the 10th March, 1556-7, a letter was sent to him, dated at Striving, and subscribed by the Earl of Glencairn, Lord Erskine, Lord Iars, and James Stewart, prior of St. Andrew's, in which they give him a hopeful account of Knox's success in the position of matters at home, ^{to return to Scotland,} and earnestly request him to return to his native country, to aid and encourage the friends of the Gospel in their struggles.—I dearly beloved in the Lord, the faithful that are of your acquaintance in these parts, thanks be unto God, are steadfast in the belief wherein you left them, and have a godly thirst and desire day by day of your presence again; which, if the spirit of God will so move and permit time unto you, we will heartily desire you, in the name of the Lord, that you will return again into these parts, where you shall find all the faithful that you left behind you, not only glad to hear your doctrine, but will be ready to jump lives and goods for the setting forward of the glory of God, as he will permit time. And albeit the magistrates in this country be as yet in the state you left them, yet we have no experience of any more cruelty than was before, but rather we have belief that God will augment his flock, because we see daily the friars, enemies to Christ's Gospel, in less estimation both with the queen's grace and the rest of the nobility of our realm.†

With the concurrence of Calvin, the Scottish Reformer, who shrank from no ^{Knox bore} danger when duty urged him on, ^{Geneva was the} speedily left Geneva at the call of ^{various} his countrymen; but when he had ^{ing to Scotland,} proceeded as far as Dieppe, he recoiled before a more discouraging character, which obliged him to pause. Averse to desist from a mission which he had hoped might be productive of benefit to the cause of Christ, he wrote to the lords from Striving, Oct., 1557, expostulating with them for having so soon changed their views, and exhorting them to let no temporal considerations interfere with their duty to God. "If any persuade you, he hath of dangers that may follow, to faint in your former purpose, be he esteemed never so wise and friendly, let him be judged foolish, and your mortal enemy; because he understood nothing of God's appointed wisdom; enemy to you, because he laboured to separate you from God's favour; promising to re-gaunce and grievous plagues against you, because he would that you should prefer your worldly rest to God's praise and glory, and the friendship of the wicked to the salvation of your brethren. I am not ignorant that fearful troubles must ensue upon your enterprise, as in my former letters I did signify unto you; but, Oh! joyful and comfortable are those troubles and adversities, which man sustaineth for the accomplishment of God's will; for, however terrible they be, the invisible and invincible power of God sustaineth and preserveth according to his promise all such as with simplicity do obey him." Yet it was no violent resistance of constituted authority to which the Reformer was urging his countrymen, but the unflinching profession and practice of those religious principles which they believed to be from God; for we find him, in another letter, written a few weeks later, for the same purpose as the former, speaking thus:—"But now no further to trouble you at this present, I will only advertise you of such bruit as I hear in these parts uncertainly noised, which is this—that contradiction and rebellion are made by some to the authority in that realm; for which point my conscience will not suffer me to keep back from you my counsel—yea, my judgment and commandment—which I communicate to you in God's fear, and by the assurance of his truth; which is, that none of you who seek to promote the glory of Christ do suddenly disobey or displease the authority established in things lawful; neither yet, that you assist or fortify such as for their own particular cause and worldly promotion would trouble the same. But in the bowels of Christ Jesus I exhort you, that with all simplicity and lawful obedience, joined with boldness in God, and with open confession of your faith, you seek the favours of the authority, that by it, if possible, that cause in which you labour may be promoted, or at the least not persecuted. The mighty spirit of the Lord Jesus rule your hearts in the true fear of God; open your eyes to consider your duties, and give you strength to execute the same."*

But though Knox, after waiting some time at Dieppe, felt it to be his duty to return to Geneva, yet the letters which he had thus written to the friends of the Gospel in Scotland were productive of the happiest effects. If any of them had wavered for a moment, their resolution gathered fresh strength; and a convention was held at Edinburgh, in which it was resolved to follow out their purpose of reformation, and to hold fast and avow their principles at all hazards. For mutual encouragement, they prepared and subscribed a bond, the first of those instruments which have become so famous in Scottish ecclesiastical history under the name of 'covenants.' It bears date 3rd December, 1557, and the names of the Earls of Argyle, Glencairn, and Morton, Lord Lorn, Erskine of Dun, Maitland of Lethington, and many others are appended to it. It had a vast influence upon the state of religious parties in Scotland. It proved a standard around which the friends of reformation gathered and it gave unity and consistency to their efforts. Its importance requires that we should present it to our readers.

"We, perceiving how Satan in his members, the Antichrist of our time, cruelly doth ^{Bond subscribed} rage, seeking to overthrow and ^{at Edinburgh,} destroy the Gospel of Christ and ^{3rd Dec., 1557,} his congregation, ought, according ^{the Reformers.} to our bounden duty, to strive in our master's cause even to the death, being certain of the victory in him. The which, our duty being well considered, we do promise, before the majesty of God and his congregation, that we by his grace shall with all diligence continually apply our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the most blessed Word of God and his congregation, and shall labour at our possibility to have faithful ministers, truly and purely to minister Christ's Gospel and sacraments to his people. We shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, and the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, at our whole power and waging of our lives, against Satan and all wicked power, that doth intend tyranny or trouble against the foresaid congregation. Unto the which Holy Word and congregation we do join ourselves, and so do forsake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitions, abomination, and idolatry thereof; and, moreover, shall declare ourselves manifestly enemies thereto, by this our faithful promise before God, testified to his congregation by our subscription to these presents. At Edinburgh, the third day of December, 1557. God called to witness it: Earl of Argyle, Glencairn, Morton, Archibald Lord of Lorn, John Erskine of Dun, &c."*

In this document the word 'congregation' is repeatedly employed, to denote the whole body of Christ's followers, and hence the party favourable to a reform of religion came to be called 'the Congregation,' and the leading noblemen among them were designated the 'Lords of the Congregation.' It was their object to effect a reformation of the gross abuses which deformed the Church, and to secure for their countrymen the liberty of worshipping God according to his own Word. With this view they held frequent conferences, after the subscription of the covenant; and it soon became evident, from the number of subscriptions appended to the covenant, that in all parts of the country their adherents were numerous, and in some places even outnumbered their opponents.

The friends of the Reformation now began to withdraw themselves more and more from the mass and other rites of the Romish church. Both by <sup>Increasing with-give countenance to idolatry. A true faith required an open confession, when Christ's Gospel was opposed; and not only were those persons guilty who did evil, but those also who assented to it. It was felt to be necessary, therefore, as well for avoiding the guilt of sinful compliance with error, as for promoting their own spiritual improvement and growth in religious knowledge, that they should assemble together at stated times, in the several places where they resided, to read the Holy Scriptures, and to engage in united prayer, till it should please God to give the gift of exhortation to some of the brethren, for the comfort and instruction of the rest.

These small beginnings were so greatly blessed, that within a few months something like the aspect of a church began to appear in many places. Elders were appointed by election to rule the several societies; and, in the absence of stated pastors, zealous individuals—among whom may be mentioned the Laird of Dun, David Forreth, Robert Loekhart, and Robert Hamilton—exhorted the brethren according to the grace and ability given to them. William Harlow, too, continued his labours; and Paul Methven openly preached the Gospel in various parts of Fife and Angus, and particularly in Dundee, where a reformed church was publicly set up, and the sacraments were administered in scriptural purity; and John Willock, although suffering under severe illness, laboured with much zeal in Edinburgh, and greatly encouraged and strengthened the friends of the Gospel there.*

And not only were congregations gathered in various towns, but sundry noblemen and gentlemen throughout the country took preachers into their houses to instruct their dependents, and to preach in the places over which their influence and authority extended. The Earl of Argyle thus afforded a shelter to John Douglas, who had been a Carmelite friar, but who now opposed the errors of Popery with all his might. These proceedings occasioned much uneasiness to the adherents of the Church of Rome, who felt that it would be vain to commence prosecutions against men so protected; and therefore the Archbishop of St. Andrew's used all his influence with the Earl of Argyle to induce him to dismiss Douglas. He not only wrote him a letter, which bears date 25th March, 1558, full of civility, and expressing deep interest in his welfare and in the honour of his name, but he also sent Sir David Hamilton as a special messenger to him, to set before him the evils which could not fail to accrue to himself, his house, his friends, and his servants, from the harbour which he was giving to heresy. But this ill-omened word had now lost much of its terrors, and the earl was not to be intimidated by the idea of having it associated with his name. He not only refused to dismiss his chaplain, but he entered into a defence of his character, and repelled the charges brought against his doctrine. And, with regard to the archbishop's plea of conscience, as constraining him to inquire into the heresies of Douglas, he replied, with some little spice of sarcasm:—"He preaches against idolatry; I remit to your lordship's conscience, if that be heresy or not. He preaches against adultery and fornication; I refer that to your lordship's conscience. He preaches against hypocrisy; I refer that to your lordship's conscience. He preaches against all manner of abuses and corruptions of Christ's sincere religion; I refer that to your lordship's conscience."* In his letter, the archbishop had made offer of providing the earl with a learned and orthodox teacher belonging to the Catholic Church, if he would dismiss Douglas, to which the earl replied: "God Almighty send us many of that sort, that will preach truly, and nothing but one Catholic universal Christian faith; and we Highland rude people have need of them. And if your lordship would get and provide me such a man, I should provide him a corporal living as to myself, with great thanks to your lordship, for truly I and many more have great need of such men. And because I am able to sustain more nor one of them, I will request your lordship earnestly to provide me such a man as you wrote, for the harvest is great, and there are few labourers."

At a meeting of the Congregation, held in the beginning of 1558, it was resolved, Petition of the Protestants to the Queen-regent. for the purpose of making the government acquainted with their views and proceedings, and obtaining for them the sanction of public authority, to present a petition to the Queen-regent. This document was entrusted to Sir James Sandilands, of Calder, a man of venerable age, of distinguished integrity, and of unimpeachable loyalty. What they sought was, that it should be lawful, either publicly or privately, to use the common prayers in the vulgar tongue; that when any difficult passage of Scripture occurred, it should be permitted to any qualified individual present to give an explanation of it; that the ordinance of baptism should be dispensed in the language of the people, so that all might understand the duties connected with it; that the Lord's Supper also should be administered in the same manner, and in both kinds, agreeably to Christ's appointment; and, finally, that means should be taken for restoring the lives of ecclesiastical persons, so that they might be messengers of the truth, instead of composing it by their ungodly conduct to scorn and contempt.†

Whilst the lords of the Congregation were thus employing means to rectify the abuses that prevailed in the Church, one of those wicked and barbarous deeds, of which so many stain the annals of the Church of Rome, was perpetrated by the priesthood at St. Andrew's. Walter Mill, who had been a priest himself in his youth, but who had long since relinquished the mass and other errors of Popery, was apprehended at Dysart, by two priests in the service of the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, who brought him to their master's authority, and imprisoned him in the castle. Many efforts were made in private, by threatening him with torture, to induce him to recant; and promises were also held out to him of a monk's portion all his days; but threatenings and promises were alike ineffectual to shake his constancy. At length, an assembly of bishops, abbots, and doctors of theology, was convened for his trial in the metropolitan church.

When he was brought before the meeting, he was so weak and feeble, partly from age, being now above fourscore, and partly from the treatment which he had received, that he could not without help climb up to the pulpit where he was appointed to take his place, and it was feared that he would not be able to make himself heard at all. But when he began to speak, he made the church ring with his voice; and the courage and vigour which he displayed confounded his enemies, as well as filled with joy those of his friends who were present.
When asked what he thought of the marriage of priests, he replied:—"I esteem it a blessed bond, for Christ made marriage free to all men; but you abhor it, and in the meantime you take other men's wives and daughters, and will not keep the bond that God hath made. You vow chastity, and break the same." When charged with saying that there were seven sacraments, he answered, "Give me the Lord's supper and baptism, and take you the rest, and part them among you. If there be seven, why do you omit to observe one of them yourselves—viz., marriage—and give yourselves to ungodly whore-dom?" To the charge of denying that the sacrament of the altar was the very body of Christ, his reply was, "that Scripture was not to be taken carnally, but spiritually, and that the mass was wrong, for Christ was once offered for man's sin, and was never to be offered again, having made an end of all sacrifice." He was charged with preaching secretly and privately in houses, and openly in the fields. "Yes," he replied, "and on the sea also, sailing in a ship." He was asked, in fine, whether he would recant his erroneous opinions; but he said, firmly, "I am accused of my life; I know I must die once, and therefore, as Christ said to Judas, 'Quod facis, fac cito.' You shall know that I will not recant the truth, for I am corn, and not chaff.
I will not be blown away with the wind, nor burst with the flail, but will abide both."*

At length, Sir Andrew Oliphant, one of the bishops' priests, who had proposed all the questions to him, pronounced the sentence that he should be given over to the temporal judge, and punished as a heretic. But so deep and universal was the sympathy felt for him, that the provost of the town, Patrick Lear-mouth, absolutely refused to act the part of temporal judge, and not a rope would any individual supply to bind the victim to the stake. The spiritual power, however, did not dismiss him, as should have been done, according to the vaunted theory of the Church of Rome—that she never herself inflicts punishment upon offenders, but always with deep regret hands them over to the secular arm—but one of the archbishop's own domestics was made temporal judge for the occasion, and the ropes of the archbishop's pavilion were employed to bind the victim to the stake.

The nearer the fatal moment approached, his courage waxed the greater, and it manifestly appeared that he enjoyed the support of a power higher than human. While standing upon the coals, he declared that the cause for which he suffered was not any crime laid to his charge, but his defence of the faith of Christ as set forth in Scripture, for which he declared that he most willingly sacrificed his life. He exhorted the people, as they would escape eternal death, to place their entire dependence upon Christ, the one and only sacrifice, and to relinquish the fatal errors of the Romish priests and bishops. His last words, while the flames were circling round him, were—"Lord have mercy upon me: pray people while there is time."
The substance of his address was afterwards thrown into the form of an epitaph, by Patrick Adamson, Archbishop of St. Andrew's:—

Non nostra impietas, aut actæ crimina vitæ
Armarunt hostes in mea fata truces,
Sola fides Christi, sacris signata libellis,
Quæ vitæ causa est, est mihi causa necis.

The martyrdom of Mill was not only a wicked and cruel act on the part of the Romanists, but it was egregious and suicidal folly. It excited the deepest indignation throughout the kingdom. The cruelty of the priesthood was everywhere execrated, and the constancy of the venerable martyr was the theme of universal admiration.
Many were shaken in their attachment to the Romish Church; and those who had already joined the Congregation were confirmed in the course which they had taken. In St. Andrew's, the people erected a great heap of stones upon the spot where Mill had been burned, that the memory of his sufferings might be preserved; and although the priests repeatedly caused them to be removed, and threatened curses to those who should lay down any more, still there were hands ready to deposit new stones in the place. In all parts of the country images were taken out of the churches and destroyed; and in Edinburgh in particular, the image of St. Giles, the tutelary saint of the town, was first thrown into the North Loch, and then burned to ashes.
These proceedings filled the priesthood with indignation; but in the present temper of men's minds they were afraid to proceed against the Reformers on a charge of heresy, and therefore they prevailed upon the Queen-regent to summon some of the preachers before the council, for exciting sedition among the people. But when the day appointed for their appearance arrived (19th July, 1558), they were accompanied by such a train of followers, determined to protect them from violence, that it was judged hazardous to take any measures against them till the multitude should disperse; and in order the more speedily to reduce their number, a proclamation was issued, at the suggestion of the Bishop of Galloway, commanding all who had come to the town without authority to repair to the Borders for fifteen days. Many of those who were present had but newly returned from service in that quarter, and perceiving the treacherous object of the proclamation, they went in a body to the palace to remonstrate with the queen, and declared they would not leave their preachers in the dangerous circumstances in which they were placed. James Chalmers, of Gadgirth, thus spoke in the name of the rest:—"Madam, we know this proclamation is a device of the bishops. They oppress us and our tenants; they trouble our preachers, and would murder them and us. Shall we suffer this any longer? No; it shall not be." And every man seized his weapon. Their firmness prevailed. The queen had recourse to fair words, and not only was the proclamation recalled, but the preachers were all dismissed for the present.* Not long afterwards, however, Paul Methven was summoned before a meeting of elergy, and not appearing, sentence of banishment was passed against him, and all men were forbidden to receive him, or entertain him in their houses. But he continued to preach in Dundee as usual, and the citizens not only joyfully listened to his discourses, but also supplied him with all that was needful to his comfort.

The leaders of the reforming party now felt more strongly than ever the need of united and strenuous effort; they saw that unless by their union they could effect some change of measures, they must either abandon their principles, or fall victims to the persecuting fury of their enemies. They therefore prepared a series of articles to be presented to the Queen-regent, with the view of being laid before the parliament that was to meet during the ensuing October. In these articles they humbly craved that all Acts of Parliament authorising churchmen to proceed against heretics should be abrogated or suspended, till a lawful general council met; that charges of heresy should be tried before the temporal judge, prelates and priests being allowed to appear as accusers; that parties charged with this offence should have full liberty to defend themselves, and to state anything that might fairly be viewed as disqualifying witnesses from giving evidence against them; that they should have ample opportunity of unfolding their own views and principles, and that their declaration of what they believed should have more weight attached to it than the depositions of any witnesses, as no man should suffer for religion who was not found obstinate in his damnable opinion. And, finally, it was asked that none should be condemned as heretics, unless it could be shown by the Word of God that they had erred from the faith declared by the Holy Ghost to be necessary to salvation.*

These proceedings of the Congregation gave great offence to the prelates, who formally declared that they would not do otherwise than abide from the decrees of the Council of Trent. At length it was proposed to adjust differences by a public disputation, in which the lords of the Congregation were willing to accede, on two conditions—viz. that the Word of God should be the only standard of appeal, and that their exiled brethren should be allowed to return and take part with them in the conference. But these conditions were rejected by the prelates. There were some of them, however, who proposed, as a basis of agreement, that if the Congregation would suffer the mass to be held in wonted reverence—if they would acknowledge purgatory, and allow the lawfulness of interdicting souls, and of offering up prayers for the dead—they should have liberty to use the vulgar tongue in public prayers and in the administration of the sacraments. But these propositions were either distasteful to the advocates of reform, and this project of reconciliation also fell to the ground.†

When parliament met, the Queen-regent, being desirous of procuring the consent of both parties to the bestowment of the crown matrimonial upon the young Dauphin of France, prevailed upon the lords of the Congregation not to hold upon having their articles brought forward. She represented to them in private the difficulties of her position, assured them that she was not unworthy of what they had said about the reformation of religion, and promised that when the public business was duly arranged, she would grant them what they desired. Trusting to these promises, they contented themselves with reading a protestation, in which, after referring to existing abuses, to the redress they had thought of seeking from parliament, and to the reasons which had induced them to postpone their application, they took themselves at liberty to pursue their own course in matters of religion as commonwealths might desire, without being subject to charges or liable in any way to political pains, or being held responsible for any tumults that might arise through the continuance of abuses which they were most desirous of reforming.‡

and some of the preachers were summoned to appear before the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, on the 2nd February, 1559. This prelate and the Regent had long been on very unfriendly terms, but the rapid progress which reforming principles were making induced them to bury their mutual jealousies in oblivion, and to combine their efforts for the suppression of what they both hated; and it was in consequence of assurances of support received from the Regent that the archbishop issued his summons. Representations were immediately made to the queen by a deputation of Reformers, that, after what had happened in the case of Walter Mill, they felt it to be incumbent upon them to accompany their preachers to the place of trial, and to defend them from all such barbarous treatment. Dread of the consequences of a numerous assemblage at St. Andrew's, and the conviction that the object of the trial could not be attained in such circumstances, made the Regent falter in her purpose, and she wrote to the archbishop that it would be necessary to delay proceedings for the present. At the same time, she summoned a convention of the nobles to meet at Edinburgh on the 7th of March, for the purpose of considering the religious differences of the nation; and a provincial council of the clergy was appointed to take place during the same month.*

When this council met, certain articles were presented to them by Protestant commissioners, in which it was craved that the vulgar tongue should be used in religious worship; that means should be taken to prevent unfit persons from holding ecclesiastical offices; and that bishops should enter upon office with the assent of the local barons, and parish priests with the assent of the parishioners.† Another document, consisting of thirteen articles, was laid before the council by parties adhering to the Romish Church, which also craved that certain grievances might be redressed; that the English tongue should be used in the common prayers and litanies; and that a manual should be prepared in the same language, for the instruction of those who partook of the sacraments. Some of the grievances complained of by the adherents of the Church were partially redressed, but the council would neither concede to friend nor foe that any part of the public service should be conducted in English. They also condemned all the peculiar tenets that were held by the Reformers. They threatened excommunication against all who observed the sacraments otherwise than as the Church prescribed. Parents and sponsors, who had taken their children to Protestant preachers for baptism, were required to present them anew to the Romish priests, that the rite might be properly performed; and strict search was ordered to be made after all who absented themselves from mass, that they might be dealt with according to the laws of the Church.‡

These decisive measures received the entire concurrence of the Regent, to whom the clergy, it is said, had promised a large subsidy that she might be enabled to proceed with vigour against the Reformers; and the consequence was, that the Protestant commissioners, and other friends of the Reformation, who had assembled in large numbers at Edinburgh, felt constrained to retire to the country. After their departure a Proclamation issued by the Queen-regent forbidding any to preach or to administer the sacraments without authority from the bishops, and commanding all men to observe the ensuing feast of Easter according to the rules of the Romish Church. This was a proclamation which it was impossible for the Reformers to obey. They must either trample upon all their most sacred convictions of duty, or disobey the queen. They were at no loss how to decide. They continued to preach, and to observe the ordinances of the Gospel according to their own views of Scripture; and for this offence Paul Methven, John Christison, William Harlow, and John Willock, were cited to appear before the Justiciary Court at Stirling, on the 10th May, 1559. Sureties were required for their appearance, and George Lovell, burgess of Dundee, became surety for Methven, John Erskine of Dun for Christison, Patrick Murray of Gibbermuir for Harlow, and Robert Campbell of Kinzeaneleuch for Willock.*

Immediately after this citation was issued, the Earl of Glencairn, and Sir Hugh Campbell, sheriff of Ayr, were sent to the Regent to remonstrate with her against the course she was pursuing. But she plainly declared to them that, in spite of their hearts these preachers should be banished from Scotland, though they preached as soundly as ever St. Paul did. They then reminded her of the repeated promises which she had given that the preachers should not be molested; but she scrupled not to tell them that the promises of princes should be no further strained than it seemed to them convenient to perform them. This unblushing avowal and defence of bad faith,† while it surprised Glencairn and Campbell, drew from them the remark—"that the duties of princes and subjects were reciprocal, and that if princes would not keep their promises, they could not expect subjects to acknowledge their authority." The queen was somewhat calmed by these unexpected words, and she promised to suspend the trial of the preachers, and to consider how existing differences might be adjusted. But the public adoption of reformed principles at Perth, and the intelligence which arrived from France, of measures to be adopted by France and Spain in conjunction, for the suppression of heresy, determined the Regent to persevere in her course, and to bring the preachers to trial at the appointed day.

When the time for the appearance of the ministers at Stirling drew nigh, their friends, remembering the recent martyrdom of Walter Mill, gathered together from all parts of the country, both to protect them from injustice, and to make profession of the same faith for which they were to be tried. Large numbers from Dundee and Montrose, from Angus and Mearns, assembled at Perth; but fearing lest a wrong construction should be put upon their proceedings, they sent Erskine of Dun before them to Stirling, to assure the Queen-regent that their only object was to aid the ministers in their defence, and to make confession of faith along with them. The Regent, in order to effect their dispersion, prevailed upon Erskine to remain in Stirling, and to write to his friends at Perth, advising them to return to their several homes, and assuring them that all proceedings against the ministers should be stopped. In consequence of these representations many of them did depart. The ministers, too, remained at Perth, instead of proceeding to Stirling on the appointed day. But the promises which had been given by the Regent were shamefully broken; for when they did not appear agreeably to citation, they were denounced as rebels, and all men were forbidden, under pain of rebellion, to aid them in any manner. The parties, too, who had given security for their appearance, were fined.*

But a few days before sentence was pronounced upon the preachers, John Knox had returned to his native country, feeling it to be his duty to take part in the arduous struggle to which the friends of Christ were there summoned. His presence filled the adherents of the Romish Church with consternation, and reassured the drooping spirits of the Reformers. From Edinburgh he at once proceeded to Dundee, and thence to Perth, that he might assist his brethren, and make confession of his faith along with them. His views are expressed in a letter to Mrs. Ann Locke:—"I am uncertain as yet what God shall further work in this country, except that I see the battle shall be great, for Satan rageth even to the uttermost; and I am come, I praise my God, in the brunt of the battle. For my fellow-preachers have a day appointed to answer before the Queen-regent, the 10th of this instant, where I intend, if God impede not, also to be present, by life, by death, or else by both, to glorify his godly name, who thus mercifully hath heard my long cries. Assist me, sister, with your prayers, that now I shrink not when the battle approacheth." †

Whilst Knox was in Perth, an event occurred which has been made the ground of keen invective against the Reformer and his friends, and which exposed them to no small danger at the time. He had preached a discourse, in which he condemned the adoration of images as tending to God's dishonour, and denounced the mass as an idolatrous rite. After the dismissal of the congregation, a priest, as if to show his contempt of the doctrine which had been preached, uncovered a rich altar-piece, and prepared to celebrate mass. A young boy, who was present, having said that such conduct was intolerable, the priest struck him, which provoked the boy to throw a stone at the priest, which hit upon the altar, and broke one of the images. An uproar was immediately excited. Altar, images, and all the ornaments of the church that had any appearance of idolatry were broken down. The crowd continued to increase every moment, and though the magistrates and ministers did everything in their power to quell the tumult, they were unable to restrain the fury of the people. From the church they passed to the monastery, which were speedily laid in ruins; and the charter-house also, which was a royal foundation, was not only thrown down, but the very stones and timber were carried away, till scarcely a vestige of the building was left.

This was a very disastrous occurrence to the Reformers. It was not their doing. It was the work of what Knox designates a "rascal multitude." But it was eagerly laid hold of by the Regent, as a means of covering them and their cause with odium; and she immediately prepared to let them feel the full weight of her displeasure. She summoned to Stirling the nobility and gentry, to whom she represented the Reformers as rebels, whose object was, not to effect a religious reformation as they pretended, but to subvert the authority of the government altogether. An army was immediately collected together, with which she advanced towards Perth, with the avowed determination of laying the city in ruins, and taking vengeance upon all who had been accessory to the late riots. The watchword was—"Forward upon the heretics; we shall rid the realm of them."*

The Reformers at Perth being alarmed with alarm at the report of the blow meditated against them, both wrote letters to the Regent, denying that they entertained any idea of attempting to subvert the government, and also sent messengers to all parts of the country, entreating their friends to come to their assistance. Their numbers grew with a ready response. Friends came to them from Angus and Mearns, from Fife and Perthshire; and the Earl of Glencairn brought about two thousand men with great celerity from Arbroath. These reinforcements made the Regent false in her purpose of attempting the destruction of the town; and therefore she sent the Earl of Argyll and Lord James Stewart to treat with the Congregation, with the view of bringing about an amicable adjustment of differences. The Earl of Glencairn and Erskine of Dun met them as commissioners from the Congregation, and Knox also and Wal-

An accommodation was then concluded, and the following were the articles upon which it was based:—that both armies should be dissolved, and the town opened to the queen; that none of the inhabitants should be called in question for what they had done in religion; and that no Frenchman should enter the town, nor any French garrison be placed in it.

After the conclusion of this treaty, public thanks were rendered by Knox in the midst of the assembled Congregation for the dispersion of the dark cloud which had threatened to burst upon them. And the lords of the Congregation, before retiring to their several homes, subscribed a new bond or covenant, by which they bound themselves to be faithful in maintaining the true religion, and to be ready on all occasions to defend the profession of it. This instrument, which had no small effect upon the ecclesiastical affairs of Scotland, ran in the following terms:—

“At Perth, the last day of May, 1559, the Congregations of the West Country, with the Congregations of Fife, Perth, Dundee, Angus, Mearns, and Montrose, being convened in the town of Perth, in the name of Jesus Christ, for further setting of his glory; understanding that there is nothing more necessary for the same, than to keep a constant amity, unity, and fellowship together, according as they are commanded by God, are confederate and become bounden and obliged, in the presence of God, to concur and assist together in doing all things required of God in the scripture, that may be to his glory, and with their whole powers to destroy, and put away all things that do dishonour to his name, so that God may be truly and purely worshipped. And in case that any trouble be intended against the said Congregations of any part or member thereof, the whole Congregations shall concur, assist, and convene together, to the defence of the said Congregation or persons troubled; and shall not spare labour, goods, substance, bodies, or lives, in maintenance of the liberty of the whole Congregation, and every member thereof, against whatsoever power which shall intend the said trouble for cause of religion, or any other cause depending thereupon, or lay to their charge under pretence thereof, although it happen to be coloured with any other outward cause.

The fears expressed by Knox and Willock as to the queen's adherence to the articles of the treaty were but too well founded. Before three days elapsed, they were all broken; Queen's breach some of the citizens of Perth were of the treaty. expelled from the town, and others fined. The existing magistrates were thrust out of office, and others put in their room; a garrison was placed in the town, and all worship but the Romish was interdicted. When remonstrances were made against this violation of the treaty, she only answered that princes ought not to have their promises so strictly urged. Such faithless conduct destroyed the confidence of all men in the Regent, and the Reformers were compelled to adopt a bolder course in order to save themselves from ruin. The Earl of Argyle and Lord James Stewart, feeling their honour tarnished by the breach of a treaty which they had solemnly ratified with the queen's consent, openly joined the Congregation, and determined to uphold the true religion at all hazards. Thus the queen's breach of faith recoiled upon her own head. The sacredness of promises is one of the most indispensable bonds of society; and the more elevated an individual is in rank, the evils resulting from his bad faith are only the more sweeping and calamitous.

After the accession of Argyle and Stewart to the party of the Congregation, important events took place in Fifeshire, and the principles of the Reformation rapidly rose to ascendancy. A discourse preached by Knox at Crail on the duty of boldly maintaining the Truth led the inhabitants to destroy altars and images, and all the monuments of idolatry in the town; and similar appeals were followed by like results at Anstruther, on the following day. Thence the Reformer proceeded, on the invitation of Lord James Stewart, to St. Andrew's, with the view of denouncing the errors of Popery, and persuading the inhabitants to adopt the principles of the Reformation, and to give full effect to them. But the archbishop, hearing of the attempt that was to be made, came to town on Saturday evening with a company of armed retainers, and threatened, that if Knox appeared in the pulpit he would salute him with a dozen culverins.† The friends of Knox, being alarmed for his safety, tried to dissuade him from preaching on the occasion, but he was prepared to run all hazards, and earnestly besought them to throw no obstacles in his way. "In this town and church," said he, "began God first to call me to the dignity of a preacher. When my body was absent from Scotland, reft away by the tyranny of France, my assured hope was in open audience to preach in St. Andrew's before I departed this life. Therefore, my lords, seeing God, above the expectation of many, hath brought the body to the same place where first I was called to the office of a preacher, I beseech your honours not to stop me from presenting myself to the brethren. As for the fear of danger that may come to me, let no man be solicitous, for my life is in the custody of Him whose glory I seek. Therefore I cannot so fear their boast and tyranny, that I will cease from doing my duty when God of his mercy offereth the occasion. I desire the hand or weapon of no man to defend me. I only crave audience, which if it be denied here to me at this time, I must seek further where I may have it."* And, accordingly, he did preach on the following day, with the entire concurrence of his friends, to a numerous audience, discoursing on the subject of our Lord's casting the buyers and sellers out of the temple, and showing that it was the duty of Christians to purify the Church from the shameful corruptions introduced by Popery.

The effect of his bold and eloquent appeals was so great, that the provost, magistrates, and people of the town immediately proceeded to destroy all monuments of idolatry, with the view of setting up the worship of God according to a purer form. The monasteries of the Dominican and Franciscan orders were levelled with the ground, and a great number of images and pictures were burnt in the very presence of the priests.

Informed of these proceedings, and aware that Argyll and Stewart had but few followers with them at the time, the Queen-regent determined to come upon them suddenly, and by overwhelming them at once, to crush the cause of the Reformation. But their danger becoming known, such numbers flocked to them from all quarters, that, says Calderwood, it seemed as if men rained down to them from the clouds; and by the time the royal forces reached Cupar, they presented so bold a front, and were so skilfully drawn up on Cupar-moor, that the Regent declined the unequal contest, and proposals were made for an accommodation. The queen offered a free remission of all past offences, on condition that the Reformers should abstain from all further proceedings against monasteries and abbeys, and that there should be no more public preaching among them. But the lords and whole brethren declared that the fear of no mortal creature should make them betray the Truth, or suffer idolatry in the bounds committed to their charge. At length a truce for eight days was concluded, by which it was stipulated that the French troops in the queen's service should retire from Fife, and that commissioners should be sent by her during the truce to St. Andrew's to arrange the basis of a solid peace. The latter part of this stipulation, however, was altogether disregarded, and, therefore, the lords of the Congregation felt that it was necessary, in order to protect themselves from the Regent's duplicity, to commit in arms. At the same time, the Earl of Argyll and Lord James Stewart sent to her a letter of expostulation in reference to the garrison which she had placed in Perth, contrary to the agreement which she authorised them to make with the Congregation; and receiving no answer, they and their associates repaired to Perth, expelled the garrison, and restored to the inhabitants their ancient privileges. The Bishop of Moray, having joined to the measures which had been taken to increase the citizens of Perth, and being also desirous to his share in Walter Mill's martyrdom,† they next proceeded to Scone, his place of residence, and though the leaders were desirous of saving the abbey and the palace, yet the multitude, enraged at the death of one of their number, killed by a son of the bishop, set fire to those magnificent structures, and burned them to the ground. Whilst the flames were ascending, to the sorrow and indignation of many, an aged matron, whose dwelling was near the abbey, thus expressed her satisfaction at the spectacle: "Now I see God's judgments are just, and no man is able to save when he will punish. According to my remembrance, this place has been nothing else but a den of prodigies, where those filthy beasts, the friars, have bred in darkness every sort of sin, and especially that worst wicked man the bishop. If all men knew as much as I, they would praise God, and no man would be offended."‡ Her words, as the testimony of one who had long resided near the abbey, appeased many who were indignant at the destruction of such noble buildings, and they began to look upon a result, so contrary to what had been intended, as God's just judgment upon a long course of profligacy.

Intelligence having been brought the night before the abbey of Scone was burned, of the Regent's purpose to place a garrison of Frenchmen in Stirling, the Earl of Argyll and Lord James Stewart had set out with all expedition, and had anticipated her movements. There also the numerous were pulled to the ground. The abbey and church of all the churches were broken and dilapidated, and the abbey of Cambuskenneth was destroyed. From Stirling they proceeded to Haddington, and thence to Edinburgh, which they entered without resistance on the 29th of June, 1559, the Regent having retired to Dunbar. From before their arrival, the inhabitants of the capital, freed from the restraint of Lord Scone, their period, who left the town, had begun to destroy the monasteries of the Black and Grey Friars; and the work of demolition was speedily completed by their joint efforts. All images and other monuments of idolatry were destroyed both within the town and in places adjacent. The Romish worship was entirely suppressed, and preachers were appointed to proclaim the pure doctrines of the Gospel.

The rapid progress thus made by the lords of the Congregation can only be accounted for on the supposition, that the vast body of the people were everywhere alienated from the Church of Rome, and longed for the establishment of a purer worship. Doubtless some who adhered to the Congregation were swayed by political motives only, and their object in opposing the Queen-regent was to prevent their country, which already swarmed with French soldiers, from falling under the influence of a foreign power. But the vast majority were influenced mainly by religious considerations. They were convinced of the unscriptural character of the Romish tenets; they were disgusted with the immoralities so prevalent among all orders of the priesthood; and they were indignant at the savage persecutions by which so many of the best men in the country had been destroyed. And surely it is a distinguished glory of the Congregation, that notwithstanding all the cruelty with which their party had been visited in the shape of imprisonments, and drownings, and burnings at the stake, they did not retaliate when they had the power. Not one Romanist was brought to trial and executed for his religious principles.* The Reformers burned monasteries, destroyed altars, and threw down images, but they spared human life. Fierce denunciations have been uttered against them, for their rudeness and barbarism in destroying so many rare and precious works of art. Rather should they be praised for the moderation which led them, after the extreme provocation which they had received, to direct their zeal, not against the lives of their opponents, but only against the shrines of superstition. Some seem to think that it argued greater barbarity in the Protestants to burn images and abbeys, than in the Romanists to consign human beings to the flames. Not a few are loud in condemnation of the one procedure, who scarcely allow a word to escape them in reference to the other. This is a mode of computation which we are altogether at a loss to comprehend. The Reformers were concerned about objects of infinitely greater importance than the progress of art; and if, in their zeal for the advancement of these mighty interests, they sometimes did destroy fabrics which it were to be wished they had spared, it is as absurd to censure them severely for this, as it would be to blame the man who saved you from drowning because he inflicted some scratches upon you while dragging you ashore, or the man who extinguished the flames that enveloped your dwelling because he broke some beautiful mirror, or defaced a favourite painting.

The disinterested zeal, the heroic self-devotion, the untiring self-denial of the Exalted views leading Reformers, are above all of Knox. praise. Who can read these words of Knox, contained in a letter written during the progress from St. Andrew's to Perth, and Stirling, and Linlithgow, and Edinburgh, without feeling that he was a man wholly engrossed with great and glorious objects, and who was ready at any moment to die for their advancement:—"O that my heart could be thankful for the super-excellent benefit of my God! The long thirst of my wretched heart is satisfied in abundance that is above my expectation; for now, forty days and more hath my God used my tongue in my native country to the manifestation of his glory. Whatsoever now shall follow as touching my own carcase, His holy name be praised; the thirst of the poor people as well as of the nobility here is wondrous great, which putteth me in comfort that Christ Jesus shall triumph for a space here, in the north and extreme parts of the earth. We fear that the tyranny of France shall, under cloak of religion, seek a plain conquest of us. But potent is God to confound their counsels, and to break their force. God move the hearts of such as profess Christ Jesus with us to have respect for our infancy, and open their eyes to see that our ruin shall be their destruction."*

With the view of arresting the progress of the Congregation, and detaching as Proclamation and many as possible from their stand- counter proclamation. ard, the Queen-regent issued a proclamation, in which she maintained that it was not religion, nor anything having reference to religion, that was the object of their confederacy, but the subversion of all constituted authority. To this proclamation the lords of the Congregation replied, both by a letter to the Regent and by a public proclamation of their own, in which they repelled the charges brought against them, and affirmed solemnly that their only object was to abolish idolatry, and all practices inconsistent with the Word of God, and to protect the preachers of the Gospel from the violence of wicked men. The lairds of Pittarrow and Cunningham-head were also sent to the Regent in the name of the Congregation—a safe-conduct having been provided for them—and they were instructed to assure her that it was liberty of conscience they wanted, the removal of unfit persons from ecclesiastical offices, the right administration of the Conference at sacraments, and permission to their Preston with a view to preachers to discharge their functions without molestation, till a view to accommodation. general council or a parliament within the realm should decide the controverted points. The Regent replying that she still suspected they had some higher object in view than the one alleged, a conference was appointed to take place at Preston between parties duly commissioned on both sides; but this step was productive of no benefit, for the Regent, whilst apparently conceding the free exercise of religion. proposed the stipulation, that whenever she came to any place, the Protestant ministers should be silent, and the Romish worship only be observed. To this the commissioners of the Congregation could not at all agree, for they said it would leave them no church: the Regent could change her place of residence when she pleased, and there would be no certain exercise of religion anywhere, which would be equivalent to the subversion of it. Unwilling to break off the conference without coming to some arrangement, the commissioners requested some time to consider the Regent's proposals, and after deliberation they sent Lord Ruthven and the Laird of Pittarrow with this answer—that as they would not interfere with the religious rites which the Regent might be pleased to observe, so neither could they consent that Christ's ministers should be silenced on any occasion, or that the service of God should give place to superstition or idolatry.

The delay occasioned by these negotiations began to thin the numbers of the Congregation, for many of them were under the necessity of retiring to their homes in the country, to attend to their private affairs, and not a few believed that the Regent was sincerely disposed to an amicable adjustment. But whilst amusing the Reformers with conferences and proposals, she was only waiting patiently till the necessities of their position should have summoned the bulk of them away; and no sooner was she informed of the great diminution which had taken place in their numbers, than she marched with celerity from Dunbar on a Sunday, and came within two miles of Edinburgh on Monday morning before sunrise. The Protestants were taken by surprise, and, finding themselves unable to retain possession of the capital, they agreed to a truce, which was to remain in force till the 10th of January, in which it was stipulated that they should withdraw, and allow the Regent to take possession of the town. It was also agreed, on the one hand, that the Protestants should abstain from assailing religious houses, or defacing their ornaments; and, on the other, that the free exercise of their religion should be conceded to them,* and the use of such churches as they were in possession of, till the meeting of parliament.

Agreeably to this last article of the truce, John Willock remained in Edinburgh, after the lords of the Congregation retired, to preach the Gospel to the inhabitants, and to administer all religious ordinances. John Knox had indeed been chosen by the Protestants of the capital as their minister, and he had actually begun his labours among them;

 Gospel. dangerous for him, on account of the extreme hatred borne to him by the Romanists, to remain unprotected in the midst of their army.† The great Reformer, however, was by no means idle. Although suffering under a severe malady, he went from one place to another, preaching the Gospel with his usual earnestness, and his labours were attended with distinguished success. The unsettled state of the country, and the fear of impending commotions, seem to have disposed men's minds to more than ordinary thoughtfulness. "I have been," says Knox, in a letter written at St. Andrew's, on the 2nd September, to Mrs. Ann Locke, "in continual travel since the day of appointment; and, notwithstanding the fevers have vexed me the space of a month, yet have I travelled through the most part of this realm, where (all praise be to his blessed Majesty) men of all sorts and conditions embrace the truth. Besides we have many, by reason of the Frenchmen who are lately arrived, of whom our parties hope golden hills, and such support as we be not able to resist. We do nothing but go about Jericho, blowing with trumpets, as God giveth strength, hoping for victory by his power alone. Christ Jesus is preached even in Edinburgh, and his blessed sacraments rightly ministered in all congregations where the ministry is established; and they be thus—Edinburgh, St. Andrew's, Dundee, St. Johnston, Brechin, Montrose, Stirling, Ayr. And now Christ Jesus is begun to be preached upon the south borders next unto you, in Jedburgh and Kelso, so that the trumpet soundeth over all, blessed be our God. We lack labourers, alas! and you and Mr. Wood have deceived me, who, according to my request and expectation, have not advertised my brother, Mr. Goodman."* During his numerous journeys at this time, much vigilance was required on the part of Knox to protect himself from the machinations of his unscrupulous enemies. On one occasion, Lord Seton, Provost of Edinburgh, set out in hot pursuit of Alexander Whitaker, who was proceeding from Preston to Edinburgh in company with William Knox, and slackened not the chase till he came to the town of Ormiston, where he found that the prey he was following so eagerly was not, as he had imagined, John Knox at all.

After the departure of the Protestants from Edinburgh, Willock immediately began to preach in St. Giles's Church, admonishing sinners to repent and forsake their sins, and exhorting the brethren to be steadfast and faithful under their present difficulties; and his ministrations continued to attract a numerous assemblage of people. This was by no means pleasing to the Queen-regent. She therefore sent a deputation to the magistrates and council, to request that they would choose some other place of meeting, where their minister might officiate, and allow St. Giles's Church to be appropriated to her use, that the service of the mass might be performed in it. But the magistrates replied that this had been their ordinary place of meeting for religious exercises, and that it could not be taken from them without a manifest breach of the truce; and that they would serve consent to relinquish it, nor allow services to be performed within its walls which they believed to be idolatrous. Another course of procedure was then adopted by the Regent's followers, with the view of constraining the Protestants to betake themselves to some more private place for their religious meetings. French captains and soldiers made a practice of walking in the church during the time of public worship, speaking and laughing so loud, that it was sometimes difficult to hear what the preacher said; but this rude and insolent conduct was patiently endured, because it was believed that occasion for a quarrel was sought, that there might be some plausible ground for breaking the truce. The minister was oft-times constrained to cry out against them for their noise, and to pray God to rid his people of "such locusts;" but the annoyance continued unabated.*

At the abbey of Holyrood-house, the service of common prayers, which had now continued for a considerable time, was forcibly suppressed, the funds set apart for that purpose being diverted to another object; and in the church at Leith, the pulpit which had been erected for the Protestant preachers was destroyed, and worship according to the Romish form was restored, in manifest violation of the truce.† After a time, too, at the instigation of Pellevé, Bishop of Amiens, and three doctors of the Sorbonne, who were sent from France by the princes of the house of Guise to reside at the court of the Regent, and to aid her with their counsels, the church of St. Giles was seized,‡ and after being purified by a new and solemn consecration from the pollution which it was conceived to have contracted from Protestant worship, it was appropriated entirely to the service of the Romish Church. But it admits of doubt whether this act, although most offensive to the feelings of the community, was sufficiently early to allow it to be regarded as a breach of the truce. The Protestants observed their part of the stipulations, according to Calderwood, with scrupulous fidelity—with this single exception, that on one occasion a horned cap was taken off a priest's head, and cut in four quarters, because he said he would wear it in despite of the Congregation.§

Affairs were now rapidly hastening on to a crisis. Proclamations and counter-proclamations were issued, until at length the lords of the Congregation, being joined by almost all the leading nobility, held a great council at Edinburgh,|| exceeding in number and equalling in dignity the usual meetings of parliament, at which, on the 21st October, 1559, after long deliberation, they un-

nimously passed an act suspending the Queen-regent from her office. This bold measure has been regarded by some as furnishing conclusive evidence that the Congregation were all along actuated by other motives than those which they pretended. But there seems to be no good ground for doubting that at first their motives were exclusively of a religious kind, and that throughout they continued to be predominantly of the same character. During the progress of the struggle, however, the love of civil liberty was awakened in many a bosom, and the leading motive of not a few, who ultimately joined the Congregation, was to save their country from becoming a mere appendage of France. The incorrigible duplicity of the Regent, too, rendered it impossible for the lords of the Congregation to avoid the grave step of throwing off her authority, however reluctant they might be to proceed to extremities; for they felt that no accommodation which it was possible to make, however solemn might be the sanctions with which it was confirmed and ratified, would prevent her from crushing them whenever she had them in her power. That this conviction had no small influence over them in the end is plain, from one of their own proclamations—"We are not ignorant that princes think it good policy to betray their subjects by breaking promises, be they never so solemnly made. We have not forgotten what counsel she and Monsieur d'Osell gave to the Duke against those that slew the Cardinal, and kept the castle of St. Andrew's—that what promise the list to require should be made unto them—but as soon as the castle was rendered, and things brought to such pass as was expedient, that he should chop the heads from every one of them. To which the Duke answered that he would never consent to so treasonable an act; but if he promised fidelity, he would faithfully keep it. Monsieur d'Osell said, in mockery, to the queen, in French, 'That is a good simple nature, but I know no other prince that so would do.' If this was his judgment in so small a matter, what have we to expect in this our cause? For the question is not of the slaughter of one cardinal, but of the just abolishing of all tyranny which that Roman Antichrist hath usurped above us; of the suppressing of idolatry, and of the reformation of the whole religion, by that vermin of shavelings utterly corrupted. Now, if the slaughter of a cardinal be a sin irremissible, as they themselves affirm—and if faith ought not to be kept to heretics, as their own law speaketh—what promise can she, that is ruled by the counsel and commandment of a cardinal, make to us that can be sure?"*

Beyond all question, it was the bad faith of the Regent that was mainly instrumental in bringing matters to the extremity which they now reached. Yet she was less culpable than her brothers, the Princes of Lorraine, in France, whose scheme of ‡ Robertson considers the seizure of St. Giles's Church as one of the Regent's violations of the treaty. It seems more probable, however, that it occurred after the resumption of the truce, when, of course, the treaty, though the time for which it had been made was not expired, could no longer be considered as binding. Leslie mentions that it took place some time after the arrival of Pellevé, which we know was on the 19th September; and Spottiswood assigns it to a period posterior to the passing of the act that suspended the Regent.—Robertson's History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 186.

policy with regard to England required that the principles of the Reformation should be utterly suppressed in Scotland. Their influence over the Regent was unbounded; she was a mere tool in their hands; and in order to prevent her from wavering in the line of policy which they had marked out for her, they placed at her court Romish bishops and doctors, who were always ready to stimulate her zeal and to suggest severity when she might be disposed to adopt milder measures.* With such a policy—a policy which aimed at the destruction of the dearest interests of the nation, and which was pursued with an utter disregard of all treaties and promises—there were but two alternatives presented to the Congregation—either they must be utterly suppressed, and their leaders and preachers brought to the scaffold and the stake, or they must endeavour to emancipate their country from the degradation and misery of a foreign yoke. Blessed be God, they were equal to the duties and responsibilities of their difficult position. They threw off the galling yoke of spiritual and civil bondage—they restored their native land to freedom—and they laid the foundations of a system of government whose beneficial effects we are experiencing at the present moment. Had they failed, or proved recreant to the cause of liberty, Scotland might now have been in the same condition as Italy, or Spain, or Portugal. Yet, amid all their struggles, they preserved their loyalty untainted. And the best proof that could be imagined of their uprightness and integrity in this respect is furnished by the fact that they never once thought—as their enemies alleged was their purpose—of setting aside the authority of their young queen, and putting another in her room. They maintained their allegiance to her unbroken—they never questioned her title to the throne—and they received her with open arms and hearty acclamations of welcome when shortly afterwards she returned from France to reside amongst them.

The suspension of the Regent did not put a period to the war, which continued to be prosecuted with varied success till her death, which took place on the 10th of June, 1560. Shortly after this event, ambassadors from France and England met in Edinburgh, who, in conjunction with the lords of the Congregation, concluded a peace, the leading conditions of which were, that the French troops should be immediately withdrawn from the kingdom, and that the English auxiliaries should also return at the same time to their own country, and that the Estates of the realm should meet in parliament in August to settle the affairs of the kingdom.

Three days after the departure of the French and English troops, a solemn meeting was held in St. Giles's Church, by the friends of the Reformation, for the purpose of returning thanks to God Almighty for the success with which their efforts had been crowned, and for the peace which had been so satisfactorily concluded. This meeting was attended by nearly the whole of the nobility and preachers, and by a vast concourse of people. The services were conducted by Knox. After a discourse suitable to the occasion, he poured out the gratitude of his soul in his own name and in the name of the assembled throng: "O eternal and everlasting God, Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in how miserable an estate stand this poor country, when idolatry was maintained—when virgins were deflowered, matrons corrupted, men's wives violently and villainously approached, the blood of innocents shed without mercy, and the unjust commandments of proud tyrants were obeyed as law. Out of these miseries, O Lord, could neither our wit, policy, nor strength deliver us; yea, they did but show how vain was the help of man. In these our anguishes we called unto thee, we cried for thy help, and we proclaimed thy name as thy troubled flock, persecuted for thy truth's sake. Mercifully hast thou heard us, O Lord, for neither in us nor in our confederates was there any cause why thou shouldst have given us no joyful and sudden a deliverance. O give us hearts with reverence and fear to meditate thy wondrous works late wrought in our eyes. We beseech thee, O Father of Mercies, that, as if thy well-deserved grace thou hast partly removed our darkness, suppressed idolatry, and taken from above our heads the devouring sword of merciless strangers, as it would please thee to proceed with us in this thy grace begun. And albeit there is nothing in us to move thy Majesty to show us favour, O yet, for Christ's sake, whose name we bear, we humbly pray thee to suffer us to forsake or deny thee thy verity, which now we possess. But seeing that thou hast mercifully heard us, and hast caused thy verity to triumph in us, so we crave of thee mercies unto the end, that thy godly name may be glorified in us thy creatures. And seeing that nothing is more odious in thy presence, O Lord, than impetuosity and violation of an oath and sacrament made in thy name; and seeing that thou hast made our confederates of England the instruments to set us at liberty, to whom we have promised mutual fidelity in thy name, let us never fail to that performance. O Lord, that either we declare ourselves unfaithful unto them, or profaners of thy holy name. Confound thou the counsels of those that go about to break that most godly league contracted in thy name, and retain us so firmly together by the power of thy Holy Spirit, that Satan may never have power to set us again at variance or dissent. Give us grace to live in Christian charity, that other nations, provoked by our examples, may not walk ungodly war and strife, and live in power as heathens, those who look for final deliverance by the coming again of our Lord Jesus, to whom with thee and the Holy Spirit be all honour, glory, and praise, now and ever. Amen."

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 88.

At this time, also, an allocation was made of the ministers to various parts of the kingdom, that the preaching of the Gospel might be enjoyed as extensively as possible, and that the various churches might be properly organised. John Knox was stationed in Edinburgh, Christopher Goodman in St. Andrew's, Adam Heriot in Aberdeen, John Row in Perth, William Christison in Dundee, David Ferguson in Dunfermline, Paul Methven in Jedburgh, and David Lindsay in Leith. And besides the appointment of these individuals to the leading burghs, there was another arrangement adopted, which was intended to be of a temporary character, and which was suggested apparently by the paucity of preachers. Certain persons were placed over extensive districts of country under the designation of superintendents, whose duty it was to itinerate from place to place, and to use means for procuring and settling ministers in the various churches. John Spotswood was appointed superintendent of Lothian and Merse, John Winram of Fife, John Erskine of Dun of Angus and Mearns, John Willock of Glasgow, and John Carswell of Argyle and the Isles. These arrangements were all made by the commissioners of boroughs, with some of the nobility and barons, though it was left to the various congregations and districts to decide, whether they would receive the individuals assigned to them as their ministers and superintendents.*

Yet we must not suppose that it was only now, when peace was restored, that the Protestant preachers laboured in disseminating the principles of the Gospel. We have seen that John Willock with fearless intrepidity discharged all the functions of his office in the very centre of the Regent's troops in Edinburgh; and that John Knox, at the same period, was carrying the torch of truth in his powerful hand over the length and breadth of the country. Nor were the rest of the preachers idle. In all quarters, as they could find opportunity, they exposed the errors and corruptions, and degrading ceremonial of the Papal system, and they exhibited the Holy Scriptures as the only test of what was true and salutary in religion and morals. The very dangers which surrounded them roused their zeal and courage; and the uncertainty which they felt how long they might have the opportunity of proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ to their countrymen, spurred them on to extraordinary efforts. They were willing to spend and to be spent for the sake of Christ, and their self-denying labours were crowned with abundant success. Everywhere increasing multitudes renounced the delusions of Popery, and embraced the views of the Reformers; and not a few ecclesiastics, whose minds had been gradually undergoing a change, openly joined their standard at this time, and began to preach doctrines which they had been accustomed to regard as heretical and damnable. While the war between the troops was prosecuted with continually varying success, the war of opinion exhibited one uniform result. And perhaps an earlier termination of the physical struggle, though most ardently desired by the Reformers, might not have been so advantageous to their cause. Perplexities and troubles God can overrule for the spiritual benefit of men, and times of protracted difficulty are often the means of awakening a serious and thoughtful spirit. Out of evil the sovereign ruler makes it his sublime and godlike employment to be always educing good.

It was but a feeble opposition the Romish clergy were able to give to the Reformers on the field of eloquence and argument; they were in general exceedingly illiterate; they had scarcely any knowledge of the Scriptures, and had never been accustomed to anything that deserved the name of preaching. Rites and forms, ceremonies and consecrations were the weapons which they were most expert in handling; but these had now lost all their power over a people accustomed to the pregnant discourses and heart-stirring appeals of the Reformers. An attempt was made by the Romish clergy to create a diversion in their favour, by bringing pretended miracles into the field of conflict; but the detection of the artifice and falsehood which they employed covered them with confusion, and gave a new impulse to the cause, which it was their purpose to obstruct. Proclamation was made by the friars, that they intended to give irrefragable demonstration of the truth of the system to which they adhered, by restoring to sight at the Chapel of Our Lady of Loretto, near Musselburgh, a young man who had been born blind. And sooth to say, at the appointed time, in presence of a vast multitude gathered from all quarters, a youth was produced, whom many at once recognised as a blind man whom they had seen sometimes begging by the wayside; and this individual, of whose blindness none doubted, after earnest invocation of the Virgin, and the performance of many ceremonies by the friars, actually began to see the objects around him, and went down among the people to let them test the reality of the cure by inspection of his eyes. What clearer proof could be imagined of the soundness of the principles of Popery? All the world must now be convinced that the Reformers were quite in the wrong! When the very blind were restored to sight, surely they must be blind who saw not the conclusiveness of this argument! And some such obstinate doubting people there were. Robert Colville, of Cleish, a Protestant, having persuaded the young man to go with him to Edinburgh, and having reasoned with him about the wickedness of his conduct, drew from him the confession, that he was possessed of a peculiar faculty of turning up the white of his eyes, so as to make himself appear blind, and that the friars, having become acquainted with this fact, had prevailed upon him to lend himself as an accomplice to them, and had sent him forth to beg as a blind man, that he might become generally known before the time when the miracle was to be Detection of a pretended miracle. On the following day, Cleish caused him to make a public declaration of these facts at the Cross of Edinburgh, and to exhibit to the crowd the manner in which the pretended miracle had been performed, by *flying up his eyelids and turning up the white of the eyeballs; and in order to protect him from the vengeance that would soon have despoiled him, not of his eyes merely, but of his life, he took him into his own service, and carried him along with him to his house in Fife. The blind man of Musselburgh, the winking Madonna, the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, the cures wrought at the tomb of the Abbé Paris, the holy coat of Treves—are all fruits of the same tree of wilful deception—lying wonders, that but serve to identify the Church of Rome with the mystery of iniquity spoken of by St. Paul in the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians.†

When the parliament met in August, as had been fixed in the articles of peace, the subject of religion was brought under their notice by means of a petition from a number of barons, gentlemen, burgesses, and other subjects, in which, after rehearsing the efforts which they had made for the advancement of the pure Gospel of Christ, they craved the states to interpose their authority for the reformation of all existing abuses and errors in the Church. First of all, they sought that the peculiar dogmas of the Church of Rome, such as transubstantiation, the adoration of Christ's body under the form of bread, the merit of works, Papistical indulgences, purgatory, pilgrimages, praying to departed saints—which were described as pestilent errors, most dangerous to the souls of men, and utterly unsupported by the word of God, should be condemned and suppressed. In the next place, they drew the attention of parliament to the guilt of profaning Christ's holy sacraments, and the necessity of restoring the discipline of the Church to its ancient purity; and they affirmed that the Romish clergy, so far from being patterns of good conduct, were notorious for their disregard of the most common principles of morality. And lastly, they craved that not only should the pope's usurped authority be altogether disowned, but that also a godly policy and discipline should be established by public authority, and that the revenues of the Church should be devoted to the support of the Christian ministry, the founding of schools for the instruction of the people, and the relief of the poor. This last topic was by no means agreeable to numbers of the nobility present, who had taken possession of ecclesiastical revenues in their several neighbourhoods, and were unwilling to relinquish their prey; but, in regard to the other points, they were quite prepared to sanction a change, and therefore the ministers were commissioned to draw up a summary of doctrines to be laid before parliament for their consideration. This important task was confided to John Wieram, John Spottiswood, John Willock, John Douglas, John How, and John Knox, who, in the space of four days prepared a document which they designated, the Confession of the Faith and Doctrine held by the Protestants of Scotland.*

The principles of this Confession were thoroughly sound and evangelical. It excluded all prohibited the common doctrines of the Catholic Christianity respecting the divine nature, the Trinity of persons in the Godhead, the sanctification of Christ's person, the creation of man, the fall, original sin, redemption from the curse of sin and from its power. "It behoved the Redeemer to be very God and very man, because he was to underlie the punishment due for our transgressions, and by death to overcome him who was the author of death. But because the only Godhead could not suffer death, nor the only manhood overcome the same, he joined both in one person, that the subtility of the one should be subject to death, and the invincible power of the other purchase for us life, liberty, and perpetual victory." Participation in the benefits of Christ's death was ascribed to the influence of the Holy Ghost. "For by nature we are so dead, so blind, so perverse, that neither can we feel when we are pricked, nor the light when it shineth, nor assent unto the will of God when it is revealed, unless the Spirit of the Lord Jesus quicken that which is dead, remove the darkness from our minds, and bow our stubborn hearts to the obedience of his blessed will." Care was taken at the same time to guard against the abuse which has been made in all ages of the doctrines of free grace. "It is blasphemy to say that Christ abideth in the hearts of such, in whom there is no spirit of sanctification. And therefore we fear not to affirm, that murderers, oppressors, cruel persecutors, adulterers, whoremongers, swearers, persons, idolators, drunkards, thieves, and all workers of iniquity have neither true faith, nor any portion of the Spirit of Christ. The sole test of what is good and acceptable to God is his own most holy law. To love our God, to worship and honour him, to call upon him in all our troubles, to reverence his holy name, to hear his word, to believe the same, to communicate with his holy sacraments, are the works of the first table. To honour father, mother, prince, rulers, and superior powers; to love them, to support them, yea, to obey their charges and respecting to the commandment of God, to save the lives of innocents, to repress tyranny, to defend the oppressed, to keep our bodies clean and holy, to live in sobriety and temperance, to deal justly with all men both in word and deed, and to repress all desire of our neighbour's hurt, are the good works of the second table. Our nature, however, is so corrupt and imperfect that we can never, even after we are regenerate, fulfil the works of the law, and, therefore, we must apprehend Christ Jesus with his justice and satisfaction, who is the end of the law to all that believe, by whom we are set at this liberty, that the curse and malediction of God fall not upon us, albeit we fulfil not the same in all points. Those who boast themselves of the merit of their works, or put trust in works of supererogation, boast themselves of that which is not, and put their trust in damnable idolatry.* The marks, also, of the true Church, the supreme authority of the Scriptures in matters of doctrine, the nature and legitimate use of general councils, the number, purpose, and right administration of the sacraments, and the origin and authority of civil government, are all handled at considerable length. "Those who allege Scripture to have no other authority but what is received from the kirk, are blasphemous against God and injurious to the true kirk, which always heareth the voice of her own spouse without taking upon her to be mistress over the same. If men, under the name of a council, pretend to forge new articles of faith, or to make constitutions repugning to the Word of God, then utterly must we refuse the same as the doctrines of devils. The reason why councils assembled was not to make new articles of faith, nor to give authority to the Word of God, much less to make that his Word which was not his Word before, or that a true interpretation which before had no solid foundation. The purpose of councils was partly to confute heresies and partly to make a public confession of their faith to posterity, which they did by the authority of God's written Word, and not under any idea that they could not err, in virtue of being a general council."

The Confession of Faith prepared by Knox and his associates is not equal in respect of precision and method to Confessions that have been subsequently composed. It is in some points too full, in others it is deficient, and, upon the whole, it has too much of a polemical character. Nevertheless, it is a valuable document, and embodies a great mass of sound religious truth. It was first presented to the lords of Articles, whose approbation it received, and then it was formally laid before the whole parliament. The framers of it were in attendance to answer any questions that might be put regarding it. It was read article by article, on two several occasions, that all might have the opportunity of hearing it, and that no undue precipitancy might be shown in a matter of such importance; and, at the same time, ample opportunity was conceded to all parties to state their views and objections. The only individuals belonging to the temporal estate, who expressed dissatisfaction, were the Earl of Athol, and Lords Somerville and Borthwick, who said, they would believe as their fathers before them had believed.

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 94—120. Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 14—57.

The Romish prelates maintained a profound silence. This led the Earl Marischal to declare that he had long carried some favour to the Protestant views, and been jealous of the Roman religion, but this day fully convinced him of the truth of the one and of the falsehood of the other; for the bishops, whose learning made them able, and whose zeal should make them willing to defend their views, said nothing against the Confession of Faith now presented to parliament. A formal vote was taken, and the document was approved as a correct exhibition of scriptural truth, and authorised accordingly by Act of Parliament.*

Ratification of the Confession by Act of Parliament.

On the following week—viz., 24th August—there were some other acts passed, bearing upon the subject of religion, and designed to carry out the Reformation already begun. By one, all former acts were rescinded that had been made for the maintenance of idolatry, or that were inconsistent with the new Confession of Faith; another act had respect to the Pope's authority within the realm of Scotland, which it described as having been most hurtful and pre-judicial to the authority of the so-vereign, and to the common weal of the country; and which it therefore abolished in all time coming, forbidding the subjects, under pain of proscription, banishment, and disqualification for civil office, to carry any question relating to any matter in Scotland before the Bishop of Rome. A third act was directed against the mass, in which the Romish clergy are described as usurped ministers, and in which the mass itself is declared to be a profanation of the Lord's Supper; and it was ordained that no persons but those who were properly admitted, and who had power to that effect, should administer the sacraments. And not only was the mass declared to be unlawful, but penalties were also enacted both against those who performed the service, and against those who countenanced by their presence. The first offence was to be visited with confiscation of goods, the second with banishment, and the third with death.†

Abolition of the Pope's authority in Scotland.

Penalties affixed to the celebration of mass.

These severities have been loudly condemned by the enemies of the reformed religion, and cited as proofs of the extreme bigotry and intolerance of the Reformers; and doubtless they were carnal weapons that ought not to have been employed against the adherents of the old system: but from whom did the Reformers learn the use of them? The maxim had been acted upon for centuries by the Church of Rome, that pains and penalties, that fire and sword, were legitimate means of propagating truth and suppressing error; and it is no great marvel that the Protestants were not able, during the first year of their ascendancy, to unlearn a lesson so long and sedulously inculcated. Has the Church of Rome unlearned it even to the present hour? It is extremely unfair in sympathisers with Romanism to exclaim against the bigotry of the Reformers, as if they had been the first to introduce persecuting enactments—as if no such measures had ever been heard of till their day—when the fact is that for generations the Church of Rome had everywhere made pains and penalties her chief instrument in dealing with those who differed from her; and the unfairness appears the more deserving of reprobation, when it is remembered that never in one single instance did the Reformers of Scotland carry out the persecuting enactments made at this time to the extent of taking away life. Can the same be said with regard to the Romish Church in Scotland, or anywhere else? Of all men in the world, the adherents of Rome are the last who should make any complaints about persecution. We justify not the Reformers in regard to the penalties affixed to the celebration of mass—we condemn them—but we maintain that their opponents had no right to condemn them. He who chastises with scorpions should be very meek, when whips only are applied to himself. It is only the man who repudiates persecution in all cases who has a right to condemn it in any.

The ratification of the new Confession of Faith, ^{Altered position of the Reformers.} by Act of Parliament, was the most signal triumph which had yet been gained by the Reformers. The royal sanction, indeed, was as yet withheld from the document; but, though in ordinary times this would have been fatal to it, yet the whole proceedings of the period were of an abnormal character, and the Confession stood in the same position as numerous other acts which passed into laws, and were afterwards acquiesced in by the sovereign. The parliament of August, 1560, was one of the most numerous and influential that ever had met, and its decisions were the best index of the true mind of the country. By a public authority, therefore, which really represented the nation, the dogmas of the Church of Rome were set aside, and a legal sanction was given to the principles of the Reformers; so that they were now to be regarded as the only authorised teachers of religion, and the sole dispensers of religious ordinances. They stood now, with regard to the civil power, in the same position which the adherents of the Romish Church had formerly occupied. It was not enough, however, that the doctrines which Knox and his associates taught should be publicly approved and sanctioned; it was necessary also that a scheme of discipline and church government should be instituted, and that funds should be provided for the maintenance of religious ordinances, and the instruction of the young. The petition presented to parliament in August* had made emphatic mention of these important points, and it had been earnestly requested by the Reformers that some public enactments should be made with regard to them. Knox, too, in the discourse which he delivered upon the Book of Haggai, during the sitting of parliament, had drawn a parallel between the position of the Jews newly returned from Babylon and the position of the Protestants just delivered from the bondage of Rome, making a comparison between the Jewish temple and the Christian Church; and he had insisted, with his usual eloquence and earnestness, upon the sin of occupying one's self only with his own private affairs, and upon the duty of making a combined and strenuous and immediate effort to build the temple of the Lord. But the members of parliament were by no means so forward to make provision for the support of the Protestant Church, as they had been to sanction the doctrine of the new Confession. The spirit with which they received the application of the Reformers is evinced by the sarcastic remark, made by Melville of Lethington, regarding the discourse of Knox—"We must forget ourselves, and bear the burrow to build the house of God!" The subject, in fact, was quite distasteful to the great body of the nobles, and parliament separated without coming to any decision about the support and government of the Church, which was a great blow and severe discouragement to the Reformers.

The ministers, however, were not to be diverted from their purpose. They continued to urge the subject with so much earnestness, and with such weighty reasons, that the Privy Council, immediately after the dissolution of parliament, commissioned John Knox, John Winrow, John Spittiswood, John Willak, John Douglas, and John Row,† to prepare a scheme of ecclesiastical government.‡ This task they undertook with alacrity, and they performed it with the same ability and diligence which they had already shown in drawing up the Confession of Faith. "They took not their example," says Row, "from any book in the world—no, not from Geneva—but from the plan of the Holy Scriptures." They divided the work among them, and each individual prepared his allotted portion of it; and then they all met together, to bring the whole under the review of the entire body, and, by the effort of their united judgment, to give shape and form to every part of it.

When the document was completed, it was presented to the nobility, who perused it, says Knox, many days;‡ but though some of them were highly pleased with its principles, and were desirous that it should receive the sanction of law, yet many of them were averse. ^{Opposition} to the restraints which it imposed, ^{upon the nobles} and to the views which it suggested ^{of discipline}, as to the distribution of ecclesiastical property.

* It is rather an odd circumstance, that all the names who were employed in composing the First Confession of Faith, all who were first appointed to the office of session in parishes, and all who had any hand in composing the First Book of Discipline, were the ministers of parishes.

and in mockery they styled it a devout imagination. A convention of ministers and commissioners from various churches throughout the country—commonly styled the First General Assembly—was held on the 20th December. The Book of Policy and Discipline was laid before this meeting, and, after being somewhat altered and abridged, it received their approbation.* It was then submitted to the Privy Council, in January, but it was not destined to meet with the same favourable treatment from them. It was opposed by many, not because they disapproved in the slightest degree of the form of church government which the Reformers proposed to set up, but because they disliked the strict measures which were to be employed for the suppression of vice, and because they were unwilling to appropriate out of the ecclesiastical funds in their possession what was required for the support of the ministers, for the relief of the poor, and for the endowments of seats of learning. Not a few of the nobles had seized lands and revenues belonging to the Church in the vicinity of their respective estates,† and they wished to retain undisturbed possession of them. But, though not formally ratified, the Book of Discipline was

This document in reference to the Book of Policy and Discipline was subscribed by the Duke of Chathelherault, the Earls of Arran, Argyle, Glencairn, Rothes, Marischal, Monteith, and Morton; Lords James Stewart, Boyd, Yester, Ochiltree, Lindsay, Sanquhar, St. John of Torphichen, the Master of Maxwell, the Master of Lindsay, Drumlanrig, Lochinvar, Garlies, Balgarnie, Cunninghamhead; Alexander Gordon, Bishop of Galloway; Alexander Campbell, Dean of Murray, with a great many more. It bears date 27th Jan., 1560—1. †

The approbation of the Book of Discipline, expressed by these distinguished noblemen, has been described by various writers as an act of the Secret Council. It is so styled in Dunlop's Collection of Confessions, § and certainly it had all the weight of such an act, for the parties whose names were appended to it were the most distinguished and influential individuals in the country. Their expressed approbation of the Book of Discipline, coupled with the parliamentary sanction which had been given to the Confession of Faith in August, enabled the Reformers to proceed with all measures that were requisite for the due settlement of the Church. There does not appear to have been any difference of opinion at all with regard to the general framework of the ecclesiastical body that was to be substituted in place of the Romish Church, abolished by Act of Parliament, and therefore the whole country, with one consent, submitted to almost all the enactments of the Book of Discipline. It became in reality the model, in accordance with which the affairs of the Church were regulated, though it was not possessed of a strictly legal sanction.

The first Book of Discipline is a document of considerable length and of great interest. It exhibits the views which prevailed among the Reformers of Scotland regarding the order to be observed in Christ's Church, and it shows the deep anxiety which they felt to regulate all their proceedings by Scripture, and to take every means of reforming and preventing abuses. The first three heads relate to the test of sound doctrine—viz., accordance with Scripture, the right administration of the Sacraments, and the duty of abolishing idolatry and all the monuments of it. Then the nature of the Christian ministry is brought into view; and vocation to it is described as consisting in election, examination, and admission. To the people, and to every several congregation, it belongs to elect their minister; and after election the individual chosen was to be examined by the ministers

† The rapacity of the nobles, in seizing upon the lands of the Church at the time of the Reformation, has been the subject of bitter invective for many a day, and even Protestant ministers have spoken as if these properties had been wrested from them, though they were never in their possession at all. Perhaps the nobles have been more blamed in this matter than they deserved. The lands and revenues in the possession of the Church of Rome had been derived for the most part from the ancestors of the very nobles who seized them at the Reformation, and they had been acquired, not by lawful purchase, but by bringing the terrors of the spiritual world to bear upon the minds of men laid prostrate upon the bed of death, and by promising confidently to secure for them the glories of heaven in return for temporal gifts and endowments. Many estates, too, had been made over to the clergy by the living to provide masses for the deliverance of the souls of departed friends out of purgatory. When men's eyes, therefore, were opened, at the time of the Reformation, to the deceptions by which the Church of Rome had acquired the bulk of her enormous property, it is no wonder that the nobles were not very scrupulous in reclaiming estates which had been originally fished out of their hands by such means. Doubtless it was not possible to trace back every separate property to the source from which it had been originally derived, and therefore a perfectly equitable adjustment of this kind was impossible; but there can be little doubt that no small portion of the property of the Church had been acquired from the ancestors of the very individuals who seized it at the Reformation.

and elders of the Church on the leading doctrines of the Gospel; and finally his admission to office was to take place openly before the assembled congregation. Nor was the great scarcity of ministers to diminish the strictness of examination, for it was judged better to have a few well-qualified labourers than a greater number of inefficient ones; and fervent prayer meanwhile was to be made to God to thrust forth more labourers into his harvest. On account of the scarcity of ministers, men were to be appointed to read the Common Prayers and the Scriptures, and if they were diligent in extending their knowledge and cultivating their gifts, they might in the end be admitted to the office of the ministry. The same cause gave rise to the appointment of superintendents, who were to take charge of an extensive district of country. Their duty was not only to preach regularly themselves, in some part or other of their district, but also to take measures for supplying vacant churches with ministers or readers as they could be found. Yet, in the examination of candidates for admission to the ministry, they were bound to associate with themselves the ministers of the neighbouring parishes, and they were under the control of the provincial synod as much as other ministers, and might be rebuked, suspended, or deposed by them for negligence or misconduct. They were to be elected and admitted to office in the same manner as other pastors. They were not to remain more than twenty days in any one place during the course of their visitation, till they had gone through their whole bounds. Thrice every week they were to preach at the least. And when they returned to their principal town of residence, they were not to remain in it more than three or four months; and even then they were to be regularly employed in preaching.

From the appointment of superintendents by the Reformers, it has been imagined by some that it was their purpose to set up a modified episcopacy in Scotland. And certainly, if it was some form of episcopacy which they thought of establishing, it was a very different kind of episcopacy, as the facts already mentioned evince, from any episcopacy that now exists in the Church. But the terms employed in the first Book of Discipline make it plain that the office of superintendent was a temporary expedient occasioned by the great lack of ministers. Archbishop Spottiswood omits some clauses relating to superintendents; but even the passage as quoted by him implies the temporary character of the office: "It is found expedient for the erecting and planting of churches, that at this time there be elected ten or twelve superintendents." The passage as it stands in the Book of Discipline itself runs in the following terms: "We consider that if the ministers whom God hath endowed with his singular graces amongst us, should be appointed to several places, there to make their continual residence, then the greatest part of the realm should be destitute of all doctrine, which should not only be the occasion of great mourning, but also be dangerous to the salvation of many. And, therefore, we have thought it a thing most expedient at this time, that from the whole number of godly and learned men, now present in this realm, there be selected ten or twelve (for in so many provinces we have divided the whole) to whom charge and commandment should be given to plant and erect kirks, to set, order, and appoint ministers as the former order prescribes, to the countries that shall be appointed to their care where none are now."* Such terms would hardly have been employed in describing an office which the Reformers considered to be as permanent and as necessary as the office of the ministry itself. Mr. Laing, who has very thoroughly investigated this subject, and made a careful comparison of all the original documents, pronounces the appointment of superintendents to have been a temporary expedient.†

Provision was to be made for the ministry out of the rents of the Church; and ^{Stipend.} modification of the same was to be made by the judgment of the Church every year at the choosing of the elders and deacons. A larger stipend was to be given to the superintendents, on account of the greater expenditure to which they would be liable in travelling from place to place.

Schools were to be established in every parish, colleges were to be instituted in ^{Habits,} every notable town, and there were ^{Colleges and} to be three universities—viz., at St. Andrew's, Glasgow, and Aberdeen, with professors of arts, sciences, and languages, of medicine, laws, and divinity. And whilst the schools throughout the country were to be supported out of the best ecclesiastical revenue it was proposed that the maintenance of the universities should be derived from the temporalities of bishoprics and of churches collegiate.

Strict discipline was to be maintained throughout the church. Persons charge- ^{Church members} able with breaches of the law of ^{and covenants} Christ, were to be dealt with by the minister, elders, and deacons, with the view of bringing them to repentance; but if they continued obstinately in their sins, they were to be denounced publicly, and the sentence was to be promulgated through the whole realm, that none might have any kind of conversation with them. Their wives and families alone excepted, in eating, drinking, buying, selling, saluting, or conversing with them. Unto this discipline the whole realm of the realm, as well the rulers as they that are ruled, and the preachers themselves as well as the people within the Church, must be subject; the members specially, because they, as the eyes and nerves of the Church, should be the most impenetrable.

Besides ministers and superintendents there were also to be elders and deacons, the former to all the ministers in the spiritual government of the Church, and the latter to receive the rents and gather the alms of the Church, and distribute the same according to the appointment of the ministry and the Church.

Sunday was to be faithfully observed. In the forenoon the Word was to be preached, the sacraments were to be administered, and the Lord's-day marriages solemnised. In the afternoon the Catechism was to be taught, and young children were to be examined in it in the audience of all the people. Parents and masters were to instruct their children and servants; and if any neglected this duty they were liable to censure, and, in the end, to excommunication, and then their case was to be referred to the civil magistrate.

It was judged proper, also, that there should be Weekly exercise in every town a weekly exercise of prophesying, called prophesying, to be attended by the ministers and learned men of the neighbourhood for six miles round. Portions of scripture were to be read and expounded at these meetings. And all who were known to have any gifts fitted for edifying the Church were to be charged by the ministers and elders to attend, that they might be trained for serving in the vocation of the ministry. And if any disobeyed, the censures of the Church were to be used against them, with consent of the civil magistrate; for no man was to be permitted to live as he pleased within the Church, but all were to bestow their labours where it was thought they might serve to the edification of others.

The remaining articles related to marriage, burial, repair of churches, and the punishment of those who profaned the sacraments.*

Such was the substance of the famous first Merits of the Book of Discipline. It manifests the first Book of Discipline. the ardent desire which the Reformers felt to have the whole nation thoroughly instructed in the knowledge of the Gospel, and so educated that all might be able to judge for themselves. The greater part of its provisions were not only unexceptionable, but admirable; and, in fact, the far greater number of them were universally approved. The only points which excited opposition, and which hindered the book from being ratified, as the Confession of Faith had been, were the appropriation proposed of Church revenues, and the discipline to be exercised upon persons chargeable with immoralities. Many of the nobles had seized considerable portions of ecclesiastical property, and they were unwilling to abandon the prize; and the discipline which it was proposed to institute was odious in the eyes of multitudes. The Reformers did not sufficiently distinguish between the Church and the nation. Their scheme of discipline, as applied to a Church consisting of parties who have voluntarily joined it, is unexceptionable, and such as ought to exist in every Church; but the idea that such a discipline could be carried out with respect to a whole nation, or all the inhabitants of any given district, was certainly a great mistake; and it was no wonder that, viewed in this light, many styled it a devout imagination. If the Church is to be made co-extensive with the nation, then its discipline must be brought down to the standard of the world's morality; whilst, on the other hand, if it is determined to have a scriptural discipline, then it must be applied only to those who profess faith in Christ, and thus place themselves under ecclesiastical authority; and even with regard to them, what is due must involve no curtailment of civil privileges, nor appeal for enforcement to the civil magistrate.

When the enactments of parliament regarding religion were carried to France for ratification, by Sir James Sandilands, Knight of Rhodes, he was treated with great contempt and severity, particularly by the uncles of Queen

Unsuccessful mission of Sir James Sandilands to France.

Mary, who reproached him bitterly for acting so inconsistently with his position as a knight of the holy order as to take a commission from rebels, to solicit the ratification of execrable heresies. His mission altogether failed of its object; and though he made every effort to moderate the feelings of indignation that were manifested against him, he was dismissed without an answer. Meanwhile, Francis II., Mary's husband, died, and was succeeded on the throne of France by his brother, Charles IX., who, in March, sent an ambassador to Scotland—Noailles, a senator of Bordeaux—to endeavour to obtain a renewal of the alliance between the two kingdoms, and the restoration of all churchmen to the places from which they had been ejected. In the absence of Lord James Stewart, who had been commissioned to proceed to France to invite the now widowed Queen of Scotland home, the council declined giving an answer to the French ambassador; but in the end of May, after Lord James's return, a convention of the nobility was held at Edinburgh, at which the proposals of the King of France received a decided negative.* It was unanimously declared that Scotland could not abandon the alliance with England; that, having renounced the Pope's authority, she would maintain his priests and vassals no longer; and that she could not recognise the parties whose restoration to office was solicited as office-bearers in the church at all.

It has been objected to the ratification of the Confession of Faith by parliament in August, and to the establishment of the Reformed Church which ensued, that the parliament which took these grave measures was not a legal meeting. Calderwood, indeed, attempts to show that the previous pacification fully authorised the meeting, and that none of the preliminaries requisite to constitute it quite a formal parliament were wanting. But this is more than can be made good.

Alleged defect in the foundation of the Reformed Church.

True it has been shown by Tytler that the crown, the mace, and the sword were laid upon the seat or throne usually occupied by the queen. But still the fact is, that the sovereign's authority was not given for holding the parliament, and that the sovereign's ratification of what was done in the parliament was refused, when Sir James Sandilands was sent to France to obtain it. It is vain, therefore, to treat the legality of this parliament as a question of forms, and to endeavour to show that in nothing did the mode of procedure deviate from the ordinary practice of the constitution. The fact is, that the whole proceedings of the Congregation were abnormal; but it does not therefore follow that they were unjust or unwarranted. Society was in a transition state, and it was impossible that old forms could be thrown aside, and new ones adopted, without some measure of violence. No friend of the British constitution, as at present existing, can maintain that resistance to the supreme power is at all times wrong; there are times when resistance is the duty of every patriot. The simple question, therefore, is whether the Congregation were warranted in the first steps which they took in resisting the Regent, after their repeated experience of her duplicity, when they found they could trust to no promise which she gave, and when the lives of all who breathed a word against the doctrines of Rome were in hourly peril. If they were justified in refusing submission to an authority which was only watching for their destruction, which sought to compel them to worship God according to forms they considered idolatrous, then they were justified in carrying out the work on which they had entered, and it is childish trifling to object to them that they violated various forms observed in the ordinary practice of government. The opponents they had to deal with were troubled with no such squeamishness, when their own ends were to be served. It is well known, and it is acknowledged by Tytler himself,* that the Guisean faction, who directed all the movements of the Regent in Scotland, and who had Mary completely under their influence, aimed at the total destruction of the party of the Reformation in Europe. And it is also a well-attested fact, that at the commencement of the religious troubles in Scotland, the French ecclesiastics sent over to direct the Regent advised her to dissemble with the Congregation, to call a parliament at Leith or Edinburgh, and, having got the chief leaders under one roof, to seize the most violent of them, and put them to death.† Was this according to the forms of parliament? And the lords of the Congregation, forsooth, were bound, in dealing with parties who thus trampled upon all laws, human and divine, to observe every form and rule of etiquette! We have reason to bless God that they had juster notions of the duties and responsibilities of their position, and that they were enabled to complete, in spite of all opposition, the indispensable work of Reformation which they had begun. The wonder is, not that they opposed the sovereign's authority to the extent they did, but that they did not carry their opposition a great deal farther. Would a Popish country have received a Protestant queen as warmly as our ranks and conditions in Scotland welcomed Mary when she returned from France? No Romanist will say so. And yet there are Romanists who can censure the Congregation for disloyalty to Mary. But it seems to be a maxim with the adherents of Rome, that they have a right to expect immunities and privileges from Protestants, which they are under no obligation to grant in turn. Christ's golden rule does not apply to them!*

Thus was the Reformation in Scotland, which had been commenced in times of darkness and trouble, and which had been carried on for years amid great dangers and sore discouragements, brought at last, with the blessing of God, to a most triumphant issue. The faint dawn of morning had struggled through storm and tempest into the clear light of noon-day; and the work was now astonishingly complete. The mind of the nation was so thoroughly imbued with the principles of the Gospel, in consequence of the unwearied preaching of the Reformers, and the encouragement they gave to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, that the Romish dogmas never again made any progress in the country. Every effort to raise them to influence and power proved abortive. The truth of God had secured for itself a dwelling place in the mighty heart of the nation; and no creases or stains were ever able afterwards to dislodge it. May God in his great mercy maintain the pure principles of the Gospel amongst us, and enable us to be faithful in holding fast and spreading abroad the privileges we enjoy!

* It is painful to make such observations regarding any body of men, but their truth and justice can be proved to be questioned. Even at the present day the same selfishness continues to characterize the adherents of Rome—a clamorous demand for privileges is transmitted, coupled with the obstinate refusal of those to whom authority they have the power. In Romish countries we have seen, since the last few years, Protestants belonging to our own country thrown into prisons for reading and circulating the Scriptures, although in this country Romanists enjoy, by the most unbounded liberty of worship and religious liberty, the most unbounded liberty of worship and religious liberty. And what is no less marvellous than elsewhere, the Romanists of Britain never censure the opinions which are admitted in Popish countries against Protestants, which, at the slightest approach to a recantation of their principles here is met with a furious outcry against our dissenting and bigoted. Is there any Popish country where Protestants enjoy as much liberty as Romanists do in this country? Then where does the charge of intolerance fall?

CHAPTER XXIX.

MARY.

MARY was indebted for her safe passage partly to a favourable wind, and partly to a dense fog, under cover of which she was enabled to avoid the English fleet. She landed in circumstances by no means calculated to divert her from the melancholy which had fastened on her spirits in consequence of her departure from her beloved France. The day on which, after thirteen years of absence, she returned to her native kingdom, was dull and gloomy. Knox says that, "In the memory of man, that day of the year was never seen a more dolorous face of the heaven than was at her arrival, which two days after did so continue; for besides the surface wet, a corruption of the air, the mist was so thick and dark, that scarce might any man espy another the length of two pair of butts. The sun was not seen to shine two days before, nor two days after."*

Arriving at least ten days earlier than was anticipated, she found that few preparations had been made for her reception. Her greeting, however, was not on that account the less hearty or enthusiastic. All classes of her subjects hastened to express their joy and demonstrate their loyalty. "At the sound of the cannons which the galleys shot, the multitude being advertised, happy was he or she that might have the presence of the queen." Landing at ten o'clock, Mary would have proceeded immediately to Holyrood; but the defective character of the arrangements rendered it necessary that she should defer her intention till the afternoon. In the interval she remained at Leith, where she was visited by the Lord James, the Earl of Argyle, and other nobles. Accustomed to the splendid equipages of a rich and luxurious court, she was sensibly affected by the contrast presented in the miserable arrangements made for her conveyance to the palace. As there were no carriages in Scotland, she was obliged to proceed on horseback. This, in itself, was no hardship, as the queen rode well and gracefully; but as Brantôme, the French historian, relates, she was subjected on this occasion to a mortification trying enough to one of her years and disposition. Her favourite state palfrey, together with the rest of the choice stud reserved for the use of herself and ladies, had been captured by the English admiral, in the same ship with the Earl of Eglintoun, and carried into the port of London. In supplying this loss, it appears that the Lord James, probably from want of time, had not been very fortunate in the selection of steeds for the use of the royal party. This discovery of the poverty of her realm, in the presence, too, of the French nobility, was extremely mortifying to Mary. Her eyes filled with tears as she observed to her attendants—"These are not like the appointments to which I have been accustomed; but it behoves me to arm myself with patience."*

Unauspicious as was this incident, she could not but perceive that her reception, Mary's though rude, was sincere and correct reception. Her youth and beauty, and the peculiarity of her position, were all calculated to engage the interest and affection of a warm-hearted, generous people; and as they crowded round her with boisterous demonstrations of satisfaction, her momentary feelings of vexation must have given way to livelier emotions, more worthy of her character and prospects.

On her way to Holyrood she was met by a party of suppliants, who, being in some peril on account of an insurrectionary tumult which had disturbed the city about a month previous to her return, seized this favourable opportunity of suing for her majesty's pardon. As illustrative of the character of the times, we may notice the origin and nature of this disturbance. Austere in their principles and practice, the Reformers had for some time past expressed their strong disapprobation of the sports and pastimes of the people, which, however in themselves promotive of innocent recreation, were but too frequently the occasion of most disgraceful scenes. They had succeeded in prohibiting the May-games; but the popular pantomime of Robin Hood still survived. In the spring of 1561, this play was acted in Edinburgh, the principal characters being represented by servants and apprentices. The day on which it was performed happened to be a Sunday, and as a grave offence was thereby committed, the unfortunate man who had personated Robin Hood, James Kellone, a shoemaker, was committed to prison, and condemned by the magistrates to be hanged. Great efforts were made to get this severe sentence modified, but in vain. Knox and the bailies were solicited in his behalf, but they refused to interfere. But, as we are informed in the chronicles of the times, when the time of the unfortunate man's execution arrived, and the gibbet was set up, the craftsmen, apprentices, and servants flew to arms, seized the provost and bailies, and shut them up in Alexander Guthrie's writing-booth; pulled down the gibbet, and broke it to pieces; then rushed to the Tolbooth, which, being fastened from within, they broke open the doors with hammers, and delivered the condemned Robin Hood, together with all the other prisoners there, in despite of magistrates and ministers. One of the bailies imprisoned in the writing-booth shot a dag or pistol at the insurgents, and grievously wounded the servant of a craftsman. This was the occasion of a fierce conflict, which continued from three in the afternoon till eight in the evening, during which time not a man in the town made any effort to defend either provost or bailies. Eventually the rioters were so far successful as to compel the magistrates, in order to secure their release, to promise them an amnesty.* Notwithstanding this, being in some apprehension that severe measures might be yet taken against them, they took advantage of the presence of their sovereign to implore her clemency. There was evidently much propriety as well as policy in the gracious manner in which their humble petition was received and granted.

Brantôme gives a lively and amusing account of the manner in which her subjects attempted to provide for the entertainment of their queen by concerts of vocal and instrumental music, with which they regaled her during successive nights, to her great apparent satisfaction, but certainly to the grievous annoyance of her refined attendants. The apartments she then occupied in the palace were on the ground-floor. "There came," he says, "under her window, five or six hundred citizens of that town, who gave her a concert of the vilest fiddles and little rebees, which are as bad as they can be in that country, and accompanied them with singing Psalms, but so wretchedly out of tune and concord, that nothing could be worse. Ah, what melody it was! what a lullaby for the night!" Knox speaks of these musicians as "a company of honest men, who, with instruments of music, gave their salutations at her chamber window;" and adds, that "the melody, as she alleged, liked her well, and she willed the same to be continued." However, she took good care to change her apartments, and removed to a quarter of the palace less accessible to the sound of this unwelcome minstrelsy.

It is difficult at this distance of time to appreciate the very trying and difficult position then occupied by the youthful sovereign. She was only nineteen years of age, and had entered on the cares of government without experience, with but few advisers on whom she could rely with any confidence, and with a very imperfect knowledge of the manners, laws, and customs, which prevailed among the people she was called to govern. The religious controversies of the age were a source of perpetual disquiet. Both parties carried on the struggle with violence and passion. The Protestants were now in the ascendant; but the remembrance of past injuries prevented them from at all times using their power with moderation and temper. The Catholics were depressed, and the contrast of their present circumstances with their former supremacy in the state urged them to resort to the most violent expedients for the purpose of recovering their authority. Mary's situation was one in which she might not unreasonably have looked for the forbearance and sympathy of her subjects. All her prepossessions and early associations were in favour of the Romish religion; and yet from motives, not less of justice than expediency, she was bound to afford her countenance and support to that form of religion to which from principle and education she was firmly opposed, but which, as the religion of the majority, she was compelled to respect. Nor were the political circumstances of the kingdom more calculated to inspire her with confidence in this commencement of her reign. The people were rude and turbulent. The nobles, at all times difficult to control, had but only during the late disturbances accumulated considerable wealth, but, from the long absence of the sovereign, had attained to a state of independence inconsistent with the legitimate supremacy of the crown. The lengthened, and in many respects unfortunate character of the regency, had acted on the kingdom with injurious effect in weakening the authority of rulers, and engendering contempt for the law. For the last two years, in particular, a state of almost pure anarchy had prevailed—without a regent, without a supreme council, without the power or even the form of a regular government.

On the other hand, as no situation in life, however desperate, is without its partial alleviations, there were circumstances connected with Mary's advent to the throne which, if they did not altogether counterbalance the disadvantages now mentioned, at least contributed to render her position more hopeful. The presence of royalty never failed to command the attachment and respect of the Scottish people. The absence of the sovereign from Scotland had been viewed with regret by all parties, and her return was welcomed with enthusiasm. The establishment of the court at Holyrood, followed as it was by the revival of shows and pageantry, excited great and general satisfaction; but that which was most calculated to endear to her subjects their youthful queen, was her personal character, her extreme beauty, the gracefulness of her manners, her cultivated mind, and varied accomplishments. "The progress she had made in the arts and sciences, which were then esteemed necessary or ornamental, was far beyond what is commonly attained by princes: and all her other qualities were rendered more agreeable by a courteous affability which, without lessening the dignity of a prince, steals on the hearts of subjects with a bewitching insinuation." The impression which her appearance produced is thus related by Castelnau—"She quickly won the hearts of the people by the graciousness and sweetness of her deportment. Nature had endowed her with every requisite for realising the beau idéal of a female sovereign, and the Scotch were proud of possessing a queen who was the most beautiful and perfect among the ladies of that age." The circumstances of her history, also, already a melancholy one, could not fail to prepossess in her favour a chivalrous and generous-hearted people. Buchanan thus beautifully alludes to the touching interest which attached to the youthful queen:—"Born amid the storms of war, she was deprived of her father within six days after her birth. She was educated indeed cursorily by her mother, an accomplished princess; but, still amid domestic seditions and foreign wars, a prey to the strongest, and before she could be sensible of her misfortune, exposed to the most imminent hazards of chance. Next, leaving her country as if sent into banishment, and preserved with difficulty from the arms of enemies and the fury of the waves. There fortune smiled upon her for a little, exalted by an illustrious marriage; but it was only a transient glimpse of joy, for her mother and husband cut off, she was now left to sorrow and widowhood, her new kingdoms gone, and her ancient inheritance uncertain.*

Soon after Mary's arrival at the capital, an incident occurred, trifling in itself, but which, threatening to issue in a serious disturbance, indicated but too clearly the temper of the times. When the Lord James had been dispatched to France, for the purpose of persuading the queen to return to Scotland, he had maintained, in opposition to the more zealous of the Reformers, that no one should venture to interfere with the sovereign in the exercise of her religion, so long as it was confined to the precincts of her own household. It was only reasonable and just that the same liberty of conscience and freedom of worship which were granted freely to her subjects should be enjoyed by herself. On the first Sunday subsequent to her return she ordered mass to be said in the Chapel Royal. The preparations for this service caused great excitement amongst the Protestants. The Master of Lindsay, with several other gentlemen, rushed into the court of the palace, exclaiming that "the idolator priest should die the death." A law had some time previous been promulgated, forbidding, under the penalty of death, the public celebration of the mass. The tumult increasing, and the multitude, who had now collected, threatening in their fury to enter the chapel, and lay violent hands on the priest, the Lord James placed himself at the door, and succeeded in preventing the entrance of the rioters. This conduct gave great offence to many members of the Congregation. The real motive of his action is apparent enough, but his excuse was, that he wished to prevent any Scotchman from witnessing the idolatrous service. After the priest had performed his functions, he was committed to the protection of Lord Robert, the Commendator of Holyrood, and Lord John of Coldingham, who conducted him in safety to his residence. "And so," says Knox, "the godly departed with great grief of heart, and that afternoon repaired to the Abbey in great companies, and gave plain signification that they could not abide that the land which God had by his power purged from idolatry should be polluted again.†

A few days after, Mary, by advice of her Privy Council, issued a proclamation, in which she stated that a meeting of the Estates would be held shortly, in order that the religious differences among her subjects might be satisfactorily accommodated. In the meantime, she assured her subjects of her determination to uphold that form of religious worship which she found established in the country, and that any one attempting, either publicly or privately, to make innovations upon it, would be punished with death. On the other hand, she expressed her resolution to assert for herself the same liberty of conscience as she granted to others, and prohibited, under the same penalty, any of her Protestant subjects from interfering with her domestic servants, or any of the persons who had accompanied her from France, in the exercise of their religion, either within or without the palace. This proclamation was but ill-received on the part of the Reformers, who refrained, however, from any expression of their opinion. The only man who protested against it was the Earl of Arran, who, when it was made known at the Market Cross of Edinburgh, exclaimed, in the hearing of the heralds and people, "that he dissented that any protection or defence should be made to the queen's domestics, or to any that came from France, to offend God's majesty, and to violate the laws of the realm, more than to any other subject; for God's law had pronounced death against the idolator, and the laws of the realm had appointed punishment for the saying and hearing of the mass, which (said he) I here protest, be universally observed, and that none be exempted, until such time as a law, as publicly made, and as consonant to the law of God, have disannulled the former."* The following Sunday, Knox, denouncing the abominations of idolatry with his usual vehemence of manner and language, observed, that "one mass was more fearful to him than if ten thousand armed enemies were landed in any part of the realm for the purpose of suppressing the whole religion. For in our God there is strength to resist and confound multitudes, whereof, heretofore, we have had experience; but when we join hands with idolatry, it is no doubt but that God's amicable presence and comfortable defence leaveth us; and what shall then become of us."

The queen had only been a week in Edinburgh, before she took what was deemed Interview of Mary by her own party the bold and im- with Knox. prudent step of requesting an interview with the great Reformer. Whether this measure originated with herself or with her Protestant advisers, it was certainly, in the peculiar circumstances of her position, judicious and politic. Recognising in Knox the acknowledged leader of the most influential party in the state, to which in so many points she was unfortunately opposed, it was obviously her best policy to have a personal meeting with that leader, not only for the purpose of hearing his views and explaining her own, but, if possible, of conciliating one who exercised so great an influence upon the interests of her subjects and the security of her government. The circumstances of this interview, which, in many not unimportant respects, have been grossly misrepresented, are recorded by Knox himself. According to his own statement, the queen commended the conference by accusing him of exciting a part of her subjects against herself and the late Queen-mother; affirming that he had written a book against her just authority; and that he was the cause of much sedition and great slaughter in England. To which Knox replied, that "as touching that book which seemeth so highly to offend your majesty, it is most certain that I wrote it, and am content that all the learned world judge of it. I hear that an Englishman hath written against it," but I have not read him. If he have sufficiently disproved my reasons, and established his contrary proposition with as evident testimony as I have done mine, I shall not be obstinate, but shall confess my error and ignorance. But to this hour I have thought, and yet think, myself alone to be more able to sustain the things affirmed in that my work than any ten in Europe shall be able to confute."—"Ye think, then," said Mary, "that I have no just authority?"—In reply, Knox affirmed that this was by no means a just inference, from the fact of his having written against female government; his book containing a summary of his opinions, and not pledging him to resist legitimate authority—"men in all ages having their judgments free in such matters, publishing them both with pen and tongue, and yet, notwithstanding, they themselves have lived in the common society with others, and borne patiently with the errors and imperfections which they could not mend." "Even so, madam, am I content to do, in uprightness of heart, with the testimony of a good conscience. I have communicated my judgment to the world; if the realm find no inconvenience from the regiment of a woman, that which they approve I shall not further disallow than within my own breast, but shall be also well content to live under your grace, as Paul was to live under Nero."—"But," said Mary, "you speak of women in general."—"Most true it is, madam," he replied, "and yet it appeareth to me that wisdom should persuade your grace never to raise trouble for that, which to this day hath not troubled your majesty, neither in person nor yet in authority."—"But yet," she rejoined, "you have taught the people to receive another religion than their princes can allow; and how can that doctrine be of God, seeing that God commands subjects to obey their princes?"

In replying to this remark, Knox took occasion to lay down the true doctrine of the obedience which a ruler might claim from the subject, and the nature of the limitations which of necessity were attached to that obedience. In the matter of religion, for example, he contended that subjects were bound to follow not the will of their prince, but the commands of their God. "If all men in the days of the Apostles should have been compelled to follow the religion of the Roman emperors, what religion would there have been on the face of the earth? Daniel and his fellows were subjects to Nebuchadnezzar and Darius, and yet, madam, they would not be of their religion, neither of the one nor of the other."—"Yea," said Mary, "but none of these men raised their swords against their princes."—"Yet," he replied, "you cannot deny but that they resisted; for those that obey not the commandments that are given, in vain shall make."—"Nay," she said, "but they did not resist with the sword."—"God, madam," said Knox, "had not given them the power over the means."—"Think you then," said the queen, "that subjects having power may resist their princes?"—"If," said the Reformer, "princes exceed their bounds, madam, and do against that for which they should be obeyed, it is no doubt but they may be resisted, even by power; for there is neither greater honour nor greater obedience to be given to Kings or princes, than God has commanded to be given to father or mother. But so it is, madam, that the father may be stricken with a palsy, in the which he would slay his own children. Now, madam, if the children arise, approaching the father, take the sword from him, and finally bind his hands and keep him in prison till his palsy be past, think you, madam, that the children do any wrong? It is even so with princes that would murder the children of God that are subject to them. Their blind zeal is nothing but a very mad phrenzy, and, therefore, to take the sword from them, to bind their hands, and to cast them into prison, till they be brought to a more sober mind, is no disobedience against princes, but just obedience, because it agreeth with the Word of God."

This exposition of these new and startling principles so strongly affected Mary, that, says Knox, "her countenance altered, and she stood, as it were, amazed more than a quarter of an hour." Recovering herself, and turning to the Bishops, she remarked, "Well, then, I perceive that my subjects shall obey you and not me, and shall do what they list, and not what I command, and so must I be subject to them, and not they to me."—"God forbid," he replied, "that ever I should take upon myself to command any to obey me, or yet to sit subjects at liberty to do what pleaseth them. But my anxiety is, that both princes and subjects obey God; for it is He that subjecteth people under princes. Yea, God craves of kings that they be, as it were, foster-fathers to His Church, and commands queens to be nurses unto His people."—"Yea," said Mary, "but you are not the Church that I will nourish. I will defend the Church of Rome, for I think it is the true Church of God."—"Your will, madam," rejoined the stern Reformer, "is no reason; neither doth your thought make that Roman harlot to be the true and legitimate spouse of Jesus Christ. And would you, madam, that I call Rome a harlot, for that Church is altogether polluted with all kinds of heinous superstition, as well in doctrine as in manners. Yea, madam, I offer myself further to prove, that the Church of the Jews that crucified Jesus Christ was not so far degenerated from the wilderness and statutes which God gave by Moses and Aaron unto his people, when they manfully hated the Jews of God, as the Church of Rome is declined, and for more than five hundred years hath declined from the purity of that religion which the Apostles taught and planted."—"My conscience," said Mary, "is not so."—"Conscience," said Knox, "requires knowledge; and I fear, madam, that right knowledge you have none." Knox then proceeded in a few short, but emphatic, sentences to expose the idolatry of the mass, and expressed his earnest desire, "that the most learned Papist in Europe, and he that you would best believe, were present with your grace to sustain the argument; and that you would patiently abide to hear the matter reasoned to the end."—"In that wish," rejoined Mary, "you may be satisfied sooner than you believe." The conference was then closed, the Reformer parting from her majesty with these remarkable words, "I pray God, madam, that ye may be as blessed within the Commonwealth of Scotland, if it be the pleasure of God, as ever Deborah was in the Commonwealth of Israel."*

Notwithstanding the unkind treatment which Elizabeth's letter Mary had experienced from Elizabeth to Mary. both, in being refused a safe-conduct, she was still desirous of continuing on friendly terms with that princess. The latter, on hearing of the arrival of the Scottish queen, lost no time in dispatching to her a letter of congratulation, in which she gave formal assurances that she had never intended to intercept her in passing to her

* Knox, vol. ii. pp. 277—286. The important interview between Knox and Mary, the particulars of which we have just recorded with some minuteness, has been represented by a recent historian in a style which cannot be accounted for, except by the desire of the author to exhibit the character of the Reformer in an aspect calculated to diminish the respect in which he is so justly held. The exaggerations in which Mr. Tytler has indulged, and the fanciful colouring he has imparted to a plain narrative, would be amusing if they were not discreditable. In the first place, he altogether omits to state the accusations which the queen brought against Knox, omission which leaves many of the explanations of the Reformer wholly unintelligible. He states that the queen "advised him to treat with greater charity those that differed from him in opinion," an advice which has no other foundation than the imagination of the historian. If he designed to insinuate that Knox had forgotten the presence in which he stood, or had taken a mean advantage of the position of the young sovereign, he certainly has succeeded in leaving this impression on the mind of his readers. Thus he says of her that in replying to Knox, as if he had said something disrespectful and insulting, "She started and spoke with great energy," which account of her apparent excitement is a pure invention. Again, he relates of Knox, that in explaining the right of subjects in certain circumstances to resist princes, "he fixed his eyes on the young queen, and raised his voice to a tone which almost amounted to a menace"—all this being a flourish of his own. As has been well remarked, "So far as history tells us, we are left in utter darkness as to whether Knox spoke in a low whisper or with a loud tone and furious gestures, whether his eyes were on the floor or on the ceiling, or fixed on the queen or on Murray, or staring straight forward or winking askance or half shut. Mr. Tytler also informs us of Mary's feelings as precisely as if she had left a journal of each varying emotion for his service, 'she thought of her own youth and weakness—of the fierce zealots by whom she was surrounded—her mind pictured to itself, in gloomy anticipation, the struggles which awaited her, and she burst into tears.' All this is fanciful, with the exception of her weeping, which happened, as Randolph observes, at the conclusion of the conference, but whether on account of her fear or her anger, does not certainly appear."—North British Review, vol. iv.

own kingdom; that the object of the naval force she had collected was the capturing of certain pirates, to effect which she requested her assistance and co-operation. At the same time, she once more renewed the request she had so often ineffectually made—viz., that Mary would grant her the ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh. This letter was delivered by Randolph, who had now been resident in Scotland for a considerable period, and had lately been appointed the accredited agent of the English sovereign. As an acknowledgment of this communication, Mary authorised her secretary, Lethington, to proceed to the court of Elizabeth, with a message reciprocating the friendly sentiments which had been expressed towards her, and expressing her earnest wishes for the continuance of peace between the two countries. Besides being the bearer of a letter from his royal mistress, Lethington was entrusted with despatches from the nobility to Elizabeth, the contents of which were highly important. They expressed their gratitude and affection for her former good offices. They requested her to show kindness and courtesy, both in public and private, towards their queen; that her friendship, so frankly begun, might not only be preserved by good offices, but, if possible, be daily knit closer; and they on their part would omit no opportunity of exerting their zeal and anxiety for the preservation of perpetual amity between the neighbouring kingdoms.* Lethington, however, had instructions of a much more explicit character, and relating to a subject of extreme delicacy. Whether they were contained in the written papers with which he was furnished, or were merely of a verbal nature, is a matter of some uncertainty, as the original documents exist only in a mutilated state. That he was instructed as to the point alluded to is evident from the communications which he made to the English court. These related to the subject which had already given rise to so much bitterness and bad feeling, and hereafter was to be productive of more disastrous consequences—viz., the claim of Mary to the English crown, and her assumption of the arms of that kingdom. It is true that she had partially disclaimed the pretensions imputed to her, and transferred the blame of their promulgation to the world to its true authors—the ambitious Princes of Lorraine. But Mary was not disposed tamely to relinquish a claim which she regarded as founded on right and justice. Believing, however, that all hopes of making it good during the life of the reigning sovereign were at an end, she appears to have been willing to disclaim any present right to the throne of England, provided that her title to be considered as the next heir, failing Elizabeth and her offspring, were recognised by the English parliament. In this way it is obvious all parties might have been satisfied; the fears of Elizabeth as to her dangerous rival would be forever removed; the ambition of Mary would be satisfied with the acknowledgment which secured the crown to herself and her successors; ancient animosities would be buried in oblivion, and the prospective union of the two countries under one monarch would operate favourably for the preservation of peace and the cultivation of mutual friendship.*

The scheme by which Mary proposed to reconcile the differences between herself and Elizabeth was regarded by her advisers and the nobility with the highest satisfaction, and Lethington was instructed to communicate the same to the English court. The secretary, indeed, had long considered it with favour, and previous to the queen's return had alluded to it in a letter to Cecil. A more formal and explicit overture on the same difficult subject was also made by the Lord James, in a letter to Elizabeth, dated about six months after the communication of Lethington. In this remarkable epistle, he congratulated the queen on the mutual esteem which subsisted between herself and Mary, and earnestly prayed that it might be continued and strengthened. "You are tender cousins," he wrote, "both queens, in the flower of your ages, much resembling each other in excellent and goodly qualities, on whom God hath bestowed most liberally the gifts of nature and fortune, whose sex will not permit that you should advance your glory by wars and bloodshed, but that the chief glory of both should stand in a peaceable reign." He then remarks that the only ground of dispute between them related to the title put forth by Mary, and laments that such pretensions should have been ever started. "I wish to God," said he, "my sovereign lady had never, by any advice, taken in head to pretend interest or claim any title to your majesty's realm, for then I am fully persuaded you should have been, and continued, as dear friends as you be tender cousins; but now, since on her part something hath been thought of it, and first motioned when the two realms were in war together, your majesty knoweth, I fear, that unless that root may be removed, it shall ever breed unkindness between you. Your majesty cannot yield; and she may, on the other hand, think it hard, being so nigh of the blood of England, so to be made a stranger from it." He then approaches the delicate question of the recognition of Mary as heir to the throne, and proposes this as a compromise which would prove advantageous to both parties. "If,"

* So much has been said above of Mary's pretensions and title to the crown of England, that it may be proper to add a few words on this perplexing topic. The two roses—the symbols of the families of York and Lancaster—were conjoined by the marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth of York. Of this marriage were born Henry VIII. and the Lady Margaret. Henry VIII. left three legitimate children—Edward VI., his successor, who died in July, 1553; Mary, who succeeded him, and died in November, 1558; Elizabeth, who was born on the 7th September, 1533, and succeeded her sister Mary. The pretensions of the Scottish queen arose in this manner:—The Lady Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry VII., married James IV., who died in 1513, leaving by her James V., who was the father of Mary by the Duchess of Longueville, also called Mary of Lorraine and Mary of Guise.—Chalmers's Life of Queen Mary, vol. i. p. 113.

says he, "any midway could be picked out to remove this difference to both your contentments, then it is likely we should have a perpetual quietness. I have thought of it long, and never doubt communicate it to the queen my sovereign, for many of my countrymen, nor yet will hereafter follow so farther than shall seem good unto your majesty. The matter is higher than my capacity is able to compass, yet upon my simple overture your highness can lay a larger foundation. What convenience were it if your majesty's title did remain untouched, as well for yourself as for the issue of your body, to provide that to the queen my sovereign her own place were reserved in the succession to the crown of England, which your majesty will pardon me if I take to be next by the law of all nations, as she that is next in lawful descent of the right line of King Henry the Seventh, your grandfather, and in the meantime this title to be united in a perpetual friendship? The succession of realms cometh by God's appointment, according to his good pleasure, and no provision of man can alter that which he hath determined, but it may needs come to pass; yet there is appearance that, without injury of any party, this accord might breed as great quietness. Everything must have some beginning. If I may receive answer from your majesty, that you will allow of any such agreement, I will refer with the queen, my sovereign, to do what I see to bring her to some contentment. If your majesty dislike it, I will no further trouble thereafter." Able and judicious as this letter is, it is not probable that it produced any great effect on the mind of Elizabeth. From the character and temper of that princess, we may readily conclude she would not be disposed to consent to an arrangement which recognised as her successor on the throne one who had been for so long a period the object at once of her dislike and fear. "Notwithstanding all the great qualities which threw such lustre on her reign, we may observe, she was tainted with a jealousy of her right to the crown, which often betrayed her into violent and ungenerous actions. She suffered the title by which she held the crown to remain ambiguous and undetermined, rather than submit it to parliamentary discussion, or derive any addition to her right from such authority. Every pretender to the succession she observed not only with the attention which prudence prescribes, but with that aversion which suspicion inspires." †

The manner, therefore, in which she received the proposal of the Scottish queen was no other than might have been expected. Lethington was repugnant in his representations, and pressed upon her the advantage of declaring Mary her successor. At first, it appears, she refused to enter on the discussion of such a matter, and, instead of giving any reply, introduced the subject of the treaty of Edinburgh, insisting that it should be immediately ratified. Buchanan says, that after several deliberations views the queen consented to the following arrangement:—"That the queen of Scots should abstain from using the arms and titles of England and Ireland, so long as the queen of England or any of her children were alive; and, on the other hand, that the queen of England should make an act restricting herself and her posterity from impairing the queen of Scotland's right of succession to the crown of England." This, however, appears improbable, from the fact that, soon after, for the very purpose as it seems of avoiding the discussion of the succession question, Elizabeth dispatched Sir Peter Mewtas to request from Mary a confirmation of the treaty of Edinburgh—a proposal which she was quite aware would be firmly refused. The reception accorded to Lethington's proposition, and the consequent embarrassment of the English court, are pointedly alluded to in a letter from the French ambassador, Throckmorton, to Secretary Cecil. "For the matter," says he, "lately proposed to her majesty by the Laird of Lethington, in which to deal one way or other you find difficulties, even so do I think, that not to deal at all, no manner of way, is more dangerous, as well for the queen's majesty as for the realm, and especially if God should deal so unmercifully with us as to take the queen from us, without issue, which God forbid, considering the terms the State standeth in presently." The important object which Mary had in view in these negotiations of her secretary may be regarded as the true key to the policy adopted by her during the first years of her government. In conformity with this policy, she greatly favoured Mary's treatment of the Protestants, and entrusted of the Protestants. them with the administration of affairs. Her council was filled with the most eminent persons of that party, not a single Papist being admitted into any degree of confidence.* "I thank you," says Lethington to Cecil, "for your good advice towards our Papists, which hath been as yet mostly followed, and I trust since the queen's arrival they have obtained no great advantage, but, to be plain with you, be in worse case a great deal than before."

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 1796, vol. 16, p. 261.

This depression of the Romish party was a severe blow to the expectations they had formed from Mary's return to Scotland. They had suffered much in her cause, and had naturally looked for a reward proportionate to their fidelity. Instead of this, they found themselves almost universally neglected, and beheld with indignation their most bitter enemies advanced to the chief offices in the state. Treated with bare toleration in matters of religion, and politically ignored, they resolved upon adopting measures calculated to restore to them in some degree the influence they had lost. For this purpose they communicated with the Guises, but found them less disposed than on former occasions to commit themselves to the intrigues of the Romish faction. They determined, however, if possible, to bring about a renewal of the league with France, and to secure the co-operation of the queen in the carrying out of their schemes; "and if they failed—if Mary declined their great offers, and refused to 'hang her keys at their girdle—they would form a faction against her, at the head of which should stand Chatelherault, Arran, Huntly, and Hume."*

A few days after the departure of her secretary for England, the queen made her public entry into Edinburgh with great pomp. A minute and interesting account of this event is chronicled in the "Diurnal of Occurrents." Nothing was neglected which could express the duty and affection of the citizens towards their sovereign.† "Her highness," says the ancient record from which we quote, "departed from Holyrood House with her train, and rode by the long street on the north side of the burgh, till she came to the foot of the Castle-hill, where a gate (probably a kind of triumphal arch) had been erected for her to pass under, accompanied by the most part of the nobles of Scotland, with the exception of the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earl of Arran. She then rode up the bank to the castle, and dined therein at twelve o'clock. Her highness afterwards came forth from the said castle to the said burgh, at which departing the artillery shot vehemently. And thereafter, as she was descending the Castle-hill, there met her highness a convoy of young men of the burgh, to the number of fifty, their bodies covered with yellow taffaty; their arms and legs bare, coloured with black, in the manner of Moors; upon their heads black hats, and on their faces black vizors; in their mouths rings, garnished with intellable precious stones; about their necks, legs, and arms, an infinite of chains of gold. Also sixteen of the most honest men of the town, clad in velvet gowns and velvet bonnets, carried about the pall (or canopy), under which the queen rode—which pall was of fine purple velvet, lined with red taffaty, fringed with gold and silk. And after them was a cart with bairns, together with a coffer wherein was a cupboard and propyne,‡ which should be propynit

† Some interesting notices of the preparations that were made for this great event occur in the "Registers of the Council of Edinburgh;" from which it appears, that on the 28th of August, 1561, "the provost, bailies, and deacons of crafts, ordain Luke Wilson, treasurer, to deliver to every one of the twelve servants, the Javillour and Guild servants, as much French blaber as will be to every one of them one coat; also as much black stennyng as will be to every one of them one pair of hose, and one black bonnet, against the time of the triumph. Also ordain (here are set down the names of ten persons) every one of them to have and make one gown of fine black velvit reaching to their foot, lined with pan velvit; one coat of black velvit, one doublet of crimson satin, with velvit bonnet and hose. And these twelve to bear the pall (or canopy) above the queen grace's head, and none others. And all the other neighbours that shall be seen upon the gait to have side-gowns of fine French black satin, with pan velvit coats, and doublets of satin; and every man to go in his due and proper order, and the servants to order the causeway, and to make room for the nobility and neighbours aforesaid."—Register Book of the Town Council of Edinburgh, 1561.

to her highness; and when her grace came forward to the Butter-trone * of said burgh, the nobility and convoy proceeded. At the Butter-trone there was a port made of timber in most honourable manner, coloured with fine colours, and hung with sundry arms, upon the which port were singing certain bairns in most heavenlywise. Under the port was a cloud opening with four leaves, in the which was put a bonny bairn. And when the queen's highness was coming through the said port, the cloud opened, and the bairn descended down as if it had been an angel, and delivered to her highness the keys of the town, together with a Bible and a psalm-book, covered with fine purple velvet; and after the good bairn had spoken some small speeches, he delivered also to her highness three writings—the tenour thereof is uncertain. † After this, † continues the ehronicle, “the queen's grace came to the Cross, where there were standing four fair virgins, clad in most heavenly clothing; and from the Cross the wine ran out at the spouts in great abundance, and there was the noise of people casting the glasses with the wine. ‡ Our sovereign lady then came to the Salt-trone, where there were some speakers, and after one little speech, they burned upon the scaffold made at the said trone the manner of a sacrifice; and that being done, she departed to the Nether-bow, where there was another scaffold made, having a dragon in the same; and after the dragon was burned, § and the queen's grace heard a psalm sung, she passed to her abbey of Holyrood with the said convoy and nobility; and there the bairns, which were in the cart with the propyne (present), made some speech concerning the putting away of the mass, and thereafter sung a psalm. This being done, the cart came to Edinburgh, and the said honest men remained in her outer-chamber, and desired her grace to receive the said eupboard, which was double overgilt, and the price thereof two hundred marks. This being received by the queen, who thanked them, the honest men and convoy returned to Edinburgh. ||

A few days after her public entry into Edinburgh, Mary undertakes a progress through the central counties 11th Sept. burgh, Mary resolved to make a progress through the central counties, and to visit several of the principal towns, for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the general condition of that part of her kingdom. She was accompanied by fifteen ladies of her household, six of the members of her council, her unele, the Marquis d'Elbeauf, and her brother, the Lord James. The queen and her retinue departed from Holyrood on the 11th of September, and arrived at Lichington the same evening. On the following day, she held her court in the palace, and the day after proceeded to Stirling. Here, according to the account of Randolph, an unfortunate accident occurred, which, in consequence of a serious prediction, “that a queen should be burnt at Stirling,” made a great sensation. While in bed and asleep, with a lighted candle beside her, the curtains and tester took fire, “and so was like to have smothered her as she lay.” Leaving Stirling on the 15th, she advanced by Alloa, Culross, and Inverkeithing, to Leslie Castle, in Fifeshire, the seat of the Earl of Buchan, where she passed the night. On the 16th, she made her entrance into Perth, which is distant from Leslie Castle about twenty miles. Here she was received with great favour, many presents being displayed in her honour, and a heart of gold, full of gold pieces, was presented to her. The next day, while riding in procession through the streets, she was suddenly taken ill, and, being lifted from her horse, was carried into her palace in a state of insensibility. This, however, appears to have been but a slight indisposition, as the next day she rode twenty miles through the Carse of Gowrie, on her way to Dundee, where she remained two days. From thence, crossing the Tay, she proceeded to St. Andrew's, and, after a week's residence in that city, she visited Falkland, where her father James V. died; and on the 23rd September returned to Holyrood. This progress appears on the whole to have given great satisfaction to the young queen. Wherever she appeared, she was received with cordial demonstrations of attachment, and had such presents offered her as the poverty of the inhabitants permitted. None of her subjects, indeed, could fail to be attracted towards their fair sovereign, whose personal charms and gracious deportment commended her to the affection of all who saw her.

The queen now turned her attention to the state of the Borders, which for some time had been the scene of violence and crime. At this period, the want of a regular administration of justice was much felt. Laws, indeed, were in existence which aimed at the preservation of public order and the security of private property, but, from the impotence of the royal authority, the exorbitant power of the nobles, and the violence of faction, the execution of these laws was feeble, irregular, and partial. Bands of ruffians congregating on the Borders had lately resorted to excesses which called for the special notice and powerful interference of government. By the advice of her council, Mary dispatched her brother, the Lord James, at the head of a large army, to reduce them to obedience. Extraordinary powers, together with the title of the queen's lieutenant, were vested in him for this purpose. To assist him in this service, he summoned to his aid the freeholders of no less than eleven counties, with all their followers completely armed, constituting an overwhelming force, which rendered opposition useless. Proceeding to Jedburgh and Dumfries, he pursued the marauders into their strongholds, "razed their towers to the ground, hanged twenty of the most notorious offenders, sent fifty more in chains to Edinburgh, and in a meeting with the English wardens, Lord Grey and Sir John Foster, restored order and good government to the Marches."*

During the absence of the Lord James, the Roman Catholics made great efforts to be received into the confidence of Mary. Hamilton, the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, entered Edinburgh with great pomp, at the head of eighty horsemen, and repaired to court. At the same time, Mons. de Moret, an envoy from the Duke of Savoy, was admitted to an audience with the queen, and endeavoured to influence her in favour of the Romanists. In this, however, he failed, partly because she had already pledged herself to support the Reformation, and had entrusted the administration of affairs to members of the Congregation, and partly because, owing to his connection with the house of Hamilton, she had no confidence in the Archbishop of St. Andrew's. She could never forgive the Duke of Chatehault and his son in alienating themselves from the Catholic cause; and the conduct of these noblemen since her accession to the throne tended rather to increase than abate her displeasure. The former absented himself from court, and lived in retirement. The latter, though avowedly aspiring to the hand of his sovereign, had yet acted in a manner which made his pretensions appear contemptible. He was the only man of any consequence in the kingdom who had refused to consent that Mary should enjoy the exercise of her own religion, and having published a solemn protestation against it, he thereby entirely forfeited her favour.

At this period, an important meeting of the General Assembly took place, chiefly for the purpose of presenting the following supplications to the Privy Council. First, That the queen should put away her mass as well from herself as from the whole realm. Second, That the Book of Reformation and Discipline might be established. Third, That order might be taken for the sustentation of ministers. Fourth, That such as were known to be open and manifest Papists might be removed from the session. "These being considered, weighed, and divers reasons given on either side; of them all, the request for the ministers was thought most reasonable, notwithstanding they would travel with her grace for the rest." †

The Reformation was now established in Scotland, but no arrangements had been made for the support of the Protestant ministers. Hitherto they had drawn a scanty and precarious subsistence from the benevolence of their people. They now began, however, to take measures for the fulfilment of their not unreasonable expectations of being supported by the state. The vast revenues of the Popish Church were the only fund from which they could look for an endowment. These were already distributed in a manner which made no provision for the wants of the reformed clergy. They were either retained in the hands of the Romish prelates, or had been divided among the nobles, who had unjustly appropriated them to their own use. "A great majority of abbots, priors, and other heads of religious houses, had, either from a sense of duty, or from views of interest, renounced the errors of Popery; and, notwithstanding their change of sentiments, they still retained their ecclesiastical revenues. Almost the whole order of bishops, and several of the other dignitaries, still adhered to the Romish superstition; and, though debarred from every spiritual function, continued to enjoy the temporalities of their benefices. Many laymen, especially those who had been active in promoting the Reformation, had, under various pretences, and amidst the license of civil wars, got into their hands possessions which belonged to the Church. Thus, before any part of the ancient ecclesiastical revenues could be applied towards the maintenance of the Protestant ministers, many different interests required to be adjusted, many claims to be examined, and the prejudices and passions of the two contending parties demanded the application of a delicate hand."* On the meeting of the General Assembly, the ministers consulted as to the steps to be taken in order to secure a suitable provision for their wants. In this they met with considerable, and, in some cases, vehement, opposition from the nobles, who dreaded, and with reason, that any arrangements which could be entered into would be detrimental to their interests. Knox says that "the rulers of the Court began to draw themselves apart from the society of their brethren, and to fret and grudge that anything should be consulted upon without their advice. Master John Wood (then secretary to the Lord James), who before had shown himself very fervent in the cause of God, and forward in giving of his counsel in all doubtful matters, plainly refused ever to assist the Assembly again, whereof many did wonder. The courtiers drew unto them some of the lords, and would not convene with their brethren as before they were accustomed, but kept them in the abbey." †

After much contention, an act was passed by a majority of the Convention, providing that an exact account should be taken of the value of ecclesiastical benefices throughout the kingdom; that the present incumbents should be allowed to keep possession of two-thirds of their revenues; and that the remaining third should be appropriated by the queen, with the understanding that out of it she was to provide for the maintenance of the ministers, the endowment of schools, and the support of the poor. Various circumstances contributed to render this scheme inadequate for the purposes it was designed to accomplish. On the overthrow of Popery, the bishops and other dignitaries, desirous that their own relations, rather than the crown or the Protestant clergy, should be enriched at the expense of the church, had entered into transactions with their friends and kinsmen, by which large portions of ecclesiastical property passed into private hands. For this reason, they willingly connived at the encroachments of the nobles; they divided the patrimony of the church amongst their own connections, and by granting feus and perpetual leases of lands and tithes, which were confirmed by the Pope, they in a measure legalised what was strictly speaking mere usurpation. Other means were adopted by which the operation of the act was evaded or neutralised. Fraudulent returns were rendered; many refused to produce their rentals; others estimated the corn, and similar payments in kind, at an under value; and thus, by the connivance of collectors, greatly diminished the charge against themselves: so that, when every source of revenue was taken into account, it was found that the third of all the money collected fell far short of the sum necessary to afford an adequate support to the clergy. The assigning, or, as it was termed, modification of the stipends, was undertaken by the Earls of Argyle and Morton, the Lord James, and Maitland of Lethington. The Laird of Pitarrow was appointed to pay the stipends of the ministers according to their modification. "But," says Knox, "so busy and circumspect were the modifiers that the ministers should not be over wanton, that it was determined that one hundred merks Scottish was an allowance sufficient for a single man, being a common minister. Three hundred merks were the highest that was appointed to any, except unto the superintendents and a few others. Shortly, whether it was the niggardliness of their own hearts, or the care that they had to enrich the queen,* we know not; but the poor ministers, readers, and exhorters, cried out to the heaven, that neither were they able to live upon the stipends appointed, neither could they get payment of that small thing that was appointed.†

About twenty-four thousand pounds Scots appears to have been the whole sum allotted for the maintenance of the ministers. There is no doubt that this was an inadequate provision; but we cannot attach too much value to the fact of even this having been granted. It involved the legal recognition of the Reformed Church, and was an evidence of Mary's determination to uphold the religion which the majority of her subjects had accepted. The conduct of the queen in this matter gave great offence to the Romish party, who declared that nothing was now wanting but an interview between Mary and Elizabeth to complete the overthrow of the ancient faith. Cecil, the English secretary, having expressed his disapprobation that any portion of the revenues which had been taken from the bishops should be handed over to the crown, was thus answered by Randolph, who acted at all parties concerned in the arrangements:—"Where your honour," says he, "think better the diminution of the bishop's, and other things, than the augmentation of the crown thereof, what can I better say than that which I find written—'Merx meretricis et ad meretricem reversa est.' I find it neither done for zeal to Christ's religion, nor hatred to the viciousness of the lives that had it. If she did it for such, they themselves, to have enjoyed the whole, offered much more; I find, not also that all other men, besides the queen, were pleased with this: the Duke beginneth now to grieve—he must depart from seven parts of Ayrbroath; the Bishop of St. Andrew's from as much of his livings; the Lord Claud, the Duke's son in England, future successor to Paisley, also the seventh; the Abbot of Kilwinning as much besides divers others of that race: so that many a Hamilton shall shortly be turned a beggar."

* One of the objects proposed by the new scheme was the increase of the revenue of the crown. In allusion to this, Lethington, in one of his letters, observes—"The ministers being sustained, the queen will not get at the year's end so much as to buy her a pair of new shoes."

On occasion of the marriage of the Lord James with the daughter of the Earl of Mar, Lord James Marischal in the spring of 1562, created Earl of the queen, as a mark of her great attachment to her brother, created him Earl of Mar. "At this royal marriage," says Randolph to Cecil, "one thing there was which I must testify with my own hand—which is, that upon Shrove Tuesday, at night, sitting among the lords at supper in sight of the queen, and placed for that purpose, she drank with the queen's majesty, and sent me the cup of gold, which weigheth eighteen or twenty ounces. After supper, in giving her majesty thanks, she returned in many affectionate words her desire of unity and perpetual kindness with the queen, and conversed and talked long with me thereof in the hearing of the duke and the Earl of Huntly."†

The desire of Mary to continue on good terms with her sister of England was at this period strongly manifested by the anxiety she expressed for an interview with that princess. Cecil had previously advised Lethington to encourage a meeting between the two queens. The Scottish secretary was not indisposed to promote the interview, but refrained from proposing it to his sovereign, being uncertain how the comparison would be received on her part. Mary herself referred him from this difficulty by addressing a letter to Elizabeth, earnestly desiring that a meeting might as soon as possible be arranged between them. In the month of May she dispatched her secretary, Lethington, to the English court, for the purpose of arranging the preliminaries of this interview. "Our trusty and well-beloved councillor," she writes to Cecil, "the Laird of Lethington, our principal secretary, will report unto you what he has in charge from us, towards our dearest sister, the queen, your mistress, wherein we desire you, for the place of credit you occupy, to procure him by your good means favourable and hasty dispatch. Nothing doubting but that ye will give him firm credit in such things as he will declare unto you upon our behalf, being a man of a long time well known unto you, and one whom we especially trust."

This approaching interview was regarded with great suspicion by the Catholics. The Protestants were divided in opinion. Knox appears to have been strongly opposed to it. "Our Papists," says Randolph, "greatly mistrust the meeting: our Protestants as greatly desire it: our preachers, to be plain with your honour, at one word, be more vehement than discreet or learned, which I greatly lament. The little bruit that hath been here of late, that this queen is advised by the Cardinal to embrace the religion of England, maketh them now almost wild, of the which they both say and preach, that it is little than when it was at the worst. I have not so amply conferred with Mr. Knox in these matters as shortly I must, who, upon Sunday last, gave the cross and the candle such a wipe, that as wise and learned as himself wished him to have held his peace. He accompanied the same with a marvellous vehement and piercing prayer, in the end of his sermon, for the continuance of amity and hearty love with England."*

About this time the Earl of Arran became suddenly deranged, and in his madness accused himself, his father, and the Earl of Bothwell of a conspiracy to seize the person of the queen, murder the Earl of Mar, and possess themselves of the government. Arran's madness appears to be the only explanation which can be given of so improbable a plot; at least the researches of historians have not been successful, owing to the want of all authentic records on the subject, in placing it in a clearer light. This much, however, is certain, that whether the conspiracy was merely the invention of Arran, or had some foundation in truth, the madness of that nobleman was not apparent on his first discovery of the enterprise. It appears from the statements of Knox, that the accusations which compromised himself and his father, the Duke of Chatelherault, were made in the first instance to the Reformer himself. "Upon Friday," says he, "the said Earl of Arran came to the house of the said John Knox, and brought with him Master Richard Strange and Alexander Guthrie, in whose presence he said, 'I am treasonably betrayed;' and, with these words, he began to weep. Knox demanded—'Who has betrayed you?' 'One Judas or other,' said he;

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office. Many of the ceremonies of the Romish Church were retained in the Reformed Church of England. amongst the rest, the burning of candles on the altar. It was against this practice that Knox directed his sermon.

'but I know it is my life that is sought.' 'My lord,' said Knox, 'I understand not such dark manner of speaking: if I shall give you any answer, you must speak more plainly.' 'Well,' said he, 'I take you three to witness that I open things unto you, and I will write it to the queen. An act of treason is laid to my charge. The Earl of Bothwell has shown to me in council that he shall take the queen, and put her in my hands in the castle of Dunbarton; that he shall slay the Earl of Mar, Lethington, and others that now misguide her; and so shall I and he rule all. But I know that is devised to accuse me of treason, for I know that he will inform the queen of it; but I take you to witness that I open it here unto you, and I will pass incontinent, and write unto the queen's majesty, and unto my brother, the Earl of Mar.'"* On this determination he acted; for as the "Diurnal of Occurrents" informs us—"My lord of Arran came forth in ane phrenzy in the night, and passed to the queen's grace at the palace of Falkland, and said to her, that my lord duke, his father, and my lord Bothwell, and Gawin, commendator of Kilwinning, had conspired against the queen's grace and Lord James."†

Arran's disclosures appear to have been at first clear and consistent. Afterwards, however, as his malady developed itself, they became confused, and exhibited such inconsistencies in several important particulars of his statements as left no doubt as to the state of his mind. Knox adds, "that he plainly forewarned the Earl of Mar that the Earl of Arran was stricken with phrenzy, and thus, that over great credit should not be given unto his words and inventions. And as he advertised, so it came to pass. Within a few days, his sickness increased; he devised of wondrous signs that he saw in the heavens; he alleged that he was bewitched; and, finally, he behaved himself in all things so foolishly, that his phrenzy could not be hid."‡ Some credit was, notwithstanding his illness, attached to his allegations, and by order of the Council he was committed to prison—first in St. Andrew's, and afterwards in the castle of Edinburgh. The conduct of Bothwell and the Abbot of Kilwinning having given rise to some suspicions, they were apprehended and detained in custody. The only step which was taken in regard to the Duke of Chatelherault was the obliging him to resign the governorship of the castle of Dunbarton, which he had held ever since the time of his quitting the office of Regent. This nobleman was now advanced in years, and, on this occasion, was treated by the queen with kindness and consideration. In the following letter from Randolph to Elizabeth, we have a valuable testimony to the gentle and amiable character of Mary, which is all the more trustworthy as the writer cannot be charged with being prejudiced in favour of the Scottish sovereign. "For the likelihood," says he, "that the queen is not moved with any evil mind towards the duke or his, besides that which I have heard her grace say, I will only declare unto your majesty that which I myself (having many times had suspicion thereof) have observed and marked. I never saw yet, since her grace's arrival, but she sought more means to win the Duke of Chatelherault's good-will, and my Lord of Arran's, than ever they had wish to acknowledge their duties as subjects unto their sovereign. She knoweth herself in what place God hath appointed them, and that he is the revenger of all injustice. To separate them from her, being her subjects, there is no cause but disobedience and transgression of her lands. She is not ignorant also of the affection of many in this realm toward that house, how many they are, and how they are allied; wherein to attempt anything against them unjustly, or that should not manifest unto the world what their fault were, it should be her own ruin. These things an't like your majesty, are no small stays to the appetite of man's will, and much more unto her's, being a woman lately returned unto a country where never yet such obedience hath been given unto the prince or princess, as is due unto them. In token also that no such thing was meant of her part, it appeared in nothing more than in the usage of his father, of himself, and their friends, with all gentleness; the more to let them know, and the world judge, that she did love them as her kinsmen, esteemed them as her successors (if God gave her no issue), and favoured them as her subjects, if their doings do not merit the contrary. Unto the one, not long since, she promised a reasonable support towards his living, for the time of his father's life; and remitted unto the other many things that, both by law and conscience, he was in danger for both body and goods. After the detection of this crime, the queen's grace so well conceived of my Lord Arran, and judged so well of his sincere meaning towards her, that she devised with her Council what yearly sum, either of money or other thing, she might bestow upon him. What grief this is unto her heart, it hath appeared in many ways, and she hath wished that it could be known unto your majesty, without whose advice, I believe, she will not hastily determine anything against either the one or the other." Of these things, he concludes, "likewise the whole country doth bear witness, my testimony needeth the less."

About this time, disturbances on the Borders again called forth the interference of government. "Murder, robbery, and offences of all kinds prevailed to an intolerable degree; and men who had been publicly outlawed walked abroad, deriding the terrors of justice." Determined to restore tranquillity to these districts, and to vindicate the supremacy of the law, the queen dispatched the Earl of Mar with full powers to proceed against the offenders. His success was not less than that which attended him on a former expedition. Directing his march to Hawick, he surrounded it with soldiers, and, entering the market-place, proclaimed by proclamation any citizens from giving shelter to the outlaws. These, and other vigorous measures, resulted in the apprehension of fifty-three of the most notorious offenders, of whom eighteen were instantly drowned "for lack of trees and halibuts," six were hanged at Edinburgh; and the rest either acquitted or imprisoned in the castle. "By this memorable example of severity, the disturbed districts were reduced to a state of sudden and extraordinary quietness, whilst the courage and excess of Mar contributed to raise him still higher than before in the favour of his sovereign."

Many propositions of a matrimonial union had already been made to the Scottish Mary, late queen, and on the 3rd of June, 1562, there arrived at Holyrood an ambassador from Eric XIV., King of Sweden, who had, on a previous occasion solicited her hand, for the purpose of renewing the seat of that monarch. He brought with him, as a present to the queen, a full-length portrait of his master, which Mary graciously accepted, and placed in her private cabinet. He met with a courteous reception, but his offers were not entertained. On being dismissed, he was presented with many valuable gifts, and entrusted with letters and a safe-conduct for the Swedish monarch and his navy to land within any port of her realm which they might find most convenient.

To the great satisfaction of Mary, Lethington now arrived from the English Court with the welcome tidings that Elizabeth had consented to the proposal for an interview. He informed her of the arrangements which had been made with a view to that event. The Scottish queen was to be received at Berwick by the Earls of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Arundel, by whom all her travelling expenses were to be paid from the moment that she crossed the English frontier. The Duke of Norfolk was to meet her at York, to conduct her to the presence of his sovereign, in whose company she was to proceed to Nottingham, and there to spend a month in the enjoyment of "all princely pleasures and devices." Elizabeth, together with a letter, sent also her portrait to Mary. The latter received the proposal with the greatest joy, and immediately commenced preparations for her journey. She summoned a number of the principal nobles to receive at Edinburgh, and attend her in her progress. Her feelings on this subject are well represented in a letter from Randolph to Cecil, giving an account of his interview with Mary about this period. "It pleased her grace," he says, "immediately after she had conferred with the Laird of Lethington, and had received my sovereign's picture, to send for me. After she had rehearsed many such passages, as by the Laird of Lethington's report unto her grace had been spoken of her by my sovereign, concerning her sisterly affection towards her, her good-will and earnest desire to continue in peace and amity, and in special that they might see each other, she showeth unto me my said sovereign's picture, and asketh me how like that was to her lively face? I answered unto her, that I trusted her grace should shortly be judge thereof herself, and find much more perfection than could be set forth by the art of man." "That," said she, "is the thing that I have most desired ever since I was in hope thereof, and she shall well assure herself there shall be no stay in me, though I were to take any pains, or to do more than I may well say; and I trust by the time that we have spoken together, our hearts will be so eased, that the greatest grief that shall ever after be between us, will be when we shall take leave the one of the other. And, let God be my witness, I honour her in my heart, and love her as my dear and natural sister. Let me be believed of you that I do not feign." "Since, therefore," concluded Randolph, "the princesses' hearts are so wedded together, as divers ways it is manifest they are, seeing the purpose is so goodly, without other respect but to live in love, I doubt not but, how much soever the world rage thereat, the greater would be the glory unto them both, and the success of the enterprise the happier. To resolve, therefore, with your honour therein, I find in this queen so much good-will as can be possible; in many of her subjects no less desire than in herself; the rest not such that any such account is to be made of, that either can hinder the purpose, or do great good, whatsoever they become."*

It may be reasonably doubted whether the Queen of England was ever sincere in her intention of meeting with Mary. Her ministers, indeed, desired it; but there were many personal considerations which might weigh with that naturally jealous princess, and induce her to avoid the interview. Certain it is, that when every preparation had been made for the journey into England, Sir Henry Sidney † arrived at court with the tidings that the long-expected meeting was delayed till the summer of the following year. Nor were there wanting apparently good reasons for this conduct of Elizabeth. From the instructions given to Sidney, it appears that she was desirous of remaining in London or its vicinity, on account of the troubles then raging in France. The Catholics and Protestants of that country were now engaged in one of the most sanguinary conflicts which distinguished this age of religious and political contention. A league had been formed between the respective governments of France, Spain, Savoy, and Rome, for the purpose of suppressing the Reformation. The aspect of affairs became every day more serious, and Elizabeth, who had invariably extended her support to the Protestants, considered it expedient—so at least she avowed to Mary—that for the present summer she should remain at home, and watch the proceedings of the common enemy. At the same time, her communications to her sister sovereign were extremely friendly. In her instructions to Sidney, she says—"Of mere necessity, and utterly against our will and determination, we are forced to forbear that which we most desired this summer, which was to have seen our said dear sister; of the lack whereof we be sure our grief shall be more than any other care whatsoever that shall happen; and yet, for the ease of our mind and the relief of our sorrow, we have devised, and fully determined, by God's will, if our sister shall so agree, to see her and enjoy her company in the beginning of the next summer; for assurance whereof we have at present sent unto her a confirmation of the former accord, for our meeting to be at the city of York, or our castles of Pomfret or Nottingham, at any time that she shall name and appoint, betwixt the twentieth of May next and the last of August then following; with assurance of like safe-conduct for that year as was now presently intended for this."* Mary felt this disappointment keenly. She seems to have looked forward to the interview as an event which would tend to conciliate the affections of her cousin, and cement the friendship between the respective countries. On being first informed of the embassy of Sidney, her eyes filled with tears, and, retiring to her chamber, she gave passionate expression to her regret. † Conscious of her own generous intentions, this unexpected withdrawal on the part of Elizabeth appeared to her strange and suspicious. Reassured, however, by the communications of the envoy, she entrusted him with a friendly letter, and would at once have agreed to the meeting appointed for next year, had she not been advised by her secretary, Lethington, to delay her final answer till her council, the most of whom were at this time absent, could be conveniently assembled.

The queen now determined to undertake a journey through the northern part of her dominions. Before she set out, she was visited by an emissary from the court of Rome. His object was to persuade her majesty to send a representative to the Council of Trent, which was then sitting. Not daring to receive him openly, he was conducted secretly to her presence while the Protestant nobles were attending sermon. The papal messenger, however, had a narrow escape; for, returning somewhat unexpectedly, the Earl of Mar, attended by the English ambassador, Randolph, entered the ante-chamber, and but for the presence of mind of one of the queen's maids, who conveyed him away by a private entrance, he would have been seized, and not improbably put to death. Randolph says that he caught a glimpse of "a strange visage, which filled him full of suspicion," and that inquiry having been made, he was diligently sought for, and only saved by the remonstrances of the Earl of Mar. ‡

Having completed her arrangements, Mary started for Inverness, accompanied by her principal nobles. In connection with this royal progress, we have now to give some account of the conspiracy of the Earl of Huntly, which is one of the most intricate and mysterious of the Earl of Huntly. passages in Scottish history. "As it was a transaction purely domestic, and in which the English were but little interested, few original papers concerning it have been found in Cecil's collection, which is the great storehouse of evidence and information with regard to the affairs of this period." George Gordon, Earl of Huntly, who laid the foundation of the subsequent greatness of his family, was one of the nobles who had enjoyed the confidence and shared in the bounty of James IV., as a reward for the services he had rendered to that monarch. Great accessions of wealth and power were then obtained by a family already opulent and powerful. Alexander, the next earl, on receiving his appointment of lord-lieutenant of all the counties beyond the Forth, had retired from court, and, proceeding to his estates in the north, resided there in a state of princely independence. The conduct of George, the present earl, had not been such as to deserve the confidence of government. During the late commotions, under the regency of the Queen-mother, he had acted a vacillating and temporising part. At one time, when the affairs of the Congregation had appeared desperate, he had assisted the Regent in her attempts to overpower them. At another, when the prospects of the Reformers were more encouraging, he had pretended to join them, but avoided giving them any material aid. "He was courted and feared by each of the contending parties; both connived at his encroachments in the north; and by artifice and force, which he well knew how to employ alternately, and in their proper places, he added every day to the exorbitant power and wealth which he already possessed."* Huntly was a man of inordinate ambition, which he only waited for a seasonable opportunity to discover. He had long been jealous of the growing reputation and authority of the Earl of Mar, and ardently desired to supplant him in his influence with the queen. This desire was shared by the Duke of Chatelherault, to whom Huntly was closely allied, through the marriage of his son, Lord Gordon, to the daughter of Hamilton. Personal injuries had increased his animosity to Mar. He had discovered that the latter was endeavouring to persuade the queen to bestow upon him the earldom of Moray, together with the extensive domains appertaining to that title. Of these he had for many years appropriated the revenues, and enjoyed the power; and he could scarcely be expected to view with indifference their bestowment upon his rival. In addition to all this, he was indignant at the treatment he had received at court. Professing the same religion as his sovereign and regarded as the head of the Catholic party, he had not unnaturally expected to be advanced to one of the chief offices of state. Instead of this, he found himself treated with coldness and neglect—a neglect, however, of which he had perhaps the less reason to complain, as it was invariably shown to all who were not of the Protestant persuasion. His influence at court was merely nominal, although he was invested with the high office of chancellor, and had a seat in the Privy Council. He was the more keenly sensible of these slight, as, on the death of Francis, he had made large offers of service to the widowed queen, promising to afford her every assistance to re-establish the ancient faith. From these circumstances, it is probable that, being strongly disaffected to the present government, and ambitious of still greater influence than he already possessed, he had resolved upon employing his extensive resources to effect the destruction of his rival, and to secure to himself the chief power in the administration of affairs.

The most important schemes are sometimes forced into premature development in consequence of some unforeseen event, which involves the necessity of immediate action. An incident which happened at this time appears to have had this effect in the case of Huntly. Sir John Gordon, of Fintrach, one of his younger sons, having some dispute with Lord Ogilvy, attacked that nobleman at night, in the streets of Edinburgh. The latter was desperately wounded in the encounter, and Gordon was immediately arrested, by order of the magistrates, and conveyed to prison. Soon afterwards, escaping from confinement, he fled, and took refuge in his own estates. Through the influence of his mother, however, he was persuaded to submit himself to the pleasure of his sovereign, who committed him to custody in the castle of Stirling. On his way thither, he repented of his submission, escaped from his guards, and, gathering a thousand horsemen, bade defiance to the royal power. He then proceeded to the north, and induced his father, the Earl of Huntly, to join in the rebellion, which terminated in the violent death of that nobleman, his own execution, and the temporary ruin of the noble family of Huntly."

Before relating the proceedings of the rebels, we may briefly notice the progress of Mary's journey the queen in her journey to the north. "From Stirling," writes Randolph to Cecil, "she taketh her journey as far north as Inverness, the farthest part of Moray—the Morayshire, a terrible journey both for horse and man, the countries are so poor, and the winters so severe. If a her will that I should attend upon her father, it is thought that it will be a journey he has of two months or more. It is rather desired by herself than approved by her mother." It might well be called "a terrible journey," as the roads in that remote district were, at this period, and what the more than two centuries afterwards, in the most wretched condition. Randolph's account seems satisfactorily to disprove the conjecture of some historians, that this northern progress was planned by the council at the head of which was Mar, for the purpose of prejudicing Mary against Huntly, and accomplishing his ruin. "It was natural," as Mr. Tytler remarks, "that Mar should rejoice in the fall of so potent an enemy to the Protestant cause as Huntly. It is true that he availed himself of his offences to strengthen his own power; but that, prior to the rebellion, he had laid a base design to entrap him into treason, is an opinion founded on conjecture, and contradicted by fact."*

Mary commenced her progress from Edinburgh on the 11th of August, 1562, on horseback, and rode to Calder, twelve miles distant, with part of her train; and after dinner crossed the country to Linlithgow, where she was joined by others of her attendants, and passed the night in the palace. On the following day she rode to Callender House, the seat of Lord Livingstone, from whence she proceeded to Stirling Castle, where she remained till the 18th of August. The queen arrived at Old Aberdeen on the 27th of the same month. She was accompanied by Randolph, the English ambassador, the Earl of Mar, Secretary Lethington, and the greater part of the nobility. The absence of the Duke of Chatelherault, who was now restored to favour, seems to have been occasioned by the infirmities of age. After all her attendants and men-at-arms had arrived, she left Old Aberdeen on the 1st of September, intending to make a public entry into the neighbouring town of New Aberdeen, and to remain there twenty days. Departing from her design, and proceeding northward, she was pressed by Huntly to visit his magnificent residence at Strathbogie; but, notwithstanding that his invitation was supported by the majority of her council, she steadily refused, alleging that she would not visit the father of a rebel. Leaving Kinloss Abbey, where she passed the night, on the 8th of September, she set out for Darnaway Castle,† the chief mansion of the earldom of Moray. Here a Privy Council was held, at which † "Darnaway Castle, the seat of the ancient and present Earls of Moray, is in the united parishes of Dyke and Moy, partly in the county of Moray, partly in the county of Nairn, on the north side of the Moray Frith. The castle is in the Morayshire portion of the united parishes, about five miles south-west of the town of Forres. It is a magnificent old structure, built at different periods, and of irregular architecture. Randolph, Earl of Moray, nephew of King Robert Bruce, erected the great hall, one of the finest apartments of the kind in the United Kingdom, measuring eighty-nine feet in length, by thirty in breadth, and said to be capable of containing a thousand armed men. The original roof remains, and resembles that of the Parliament House at Edinburgh, and that of Westminster Hall. Earl Randolph's table and chair of state are preserved in Darnaway Castle. In 1839, Francis, tenth Earl of Moray, the direct descendant of Lord James Stuart, gave a splendid entertainment to his tenants in this noble hall, in which his great ancestor first assumed the title of Earl of Moray, and relinquished that of Mar."—Keith, Note by the Editor, vol. ii. p. 161.

earldom of Moray, which was once Earl Thomas Randolph's, to the Earl of Mar. It is both more honourable and greater in profit than the other."

From Darnaway the queen proceeded to Inverness, the gates of which, however, she found insolently shut against her. On the place being summoned, the governor declared that he held it for Lord Gordon, and that, acting under his orders, he refused her admittance. This conduct being equivalent to rebellion, the spirit of Mary was roused, and without any further parleying she prepared for an assault upon the town. "On this occasion," says Randolph, "she repented she was not a man, to know what life it was to lie all night in the fields, or walk the rounds with a jack and knapsell."† The queen having again summoned the garrison to surrender, the demand, as they were not prepared for a siege, was immediately complied with. The governor suffered the penalty of treason, and was hanged. This expedition appears to have excited the military enthusiasm of the English ambassador. "What desperate blows," he writes, "would that day have been given—when every man should have fought in sight of so noble a queen, and so many fair ladies, our enemies to have taken them from us, and we to save our honours, and not to be bereft of them—your honour may easily imagine."

Huntly appears to have taken the decisive step, and to have openly assumed arms in defiance of the proclamation of his sovereign at the period when the earldom of Moray was conferred upon his hated rival. Having assembled his vassals, and fortified his castles of Findlater, Aehendown, and Strathbogie, he pushed forward with rapid marches in the direction of Aberdeen, with the hope of seizing the person of the queen. To this place Mary had retired on leaving Inverness, having on her way summoned the castle of Findlater to surrender, but without effect. Not being provided with the means of enforcing the submission of this strong fortress, she proceeded to New Aberdeen, at the head of three thousand men. "The Earl of Huntly," says Knox, "was then charged to deliver the said castles, on pain of treason. To show some obedience, he caused the keys of both to be presented by his servant, Mr. Thomas Ker. But before this the queen had sent Captain Stuart, with six score of soldiers, to lie about the said place of Findlater. Upon a certain night, Sir John Gordon, falling upon them with a company of horsemen, captured their leader, slew certain of the soldiers, and disarmed the rest. This fact so inflamed the queen, that all hope of reconciliation was past; and so the said Earl of Huntly was charged, under pain of putting him to the horne, to present himself and the said Sir John before the queen and council within six days; which charge he disobeyed, and so was pronounced a rebel,"‡

but, as he advanced towards Aberdeen, they gradually melted away, till they numbered only between Moray encounters seven and eight hundred. He and found himself opposed by the Earls defeats Huntly. of Moray, Morton, and Atholl, at the head of upwards of two thousand men. Of these, however, a considerable number could not be trusted. They were brought into the field by the neighbouring barons, who were suspected of being favourable to the designs of Huntly. The latter posted his army on a hill named Corrichie, a very advantageous position, about twelve miles distant from the city. The adherents in whose fidelity Moray had placed but little confidence were the Forbesees, Hays, and Leslies, whose conduct in immediately betaking themselves to flight, on the first attack, amply justified his suspicions. But Moray, who was both a prudent leader and a courageous soldier, with a small but determined force took up a position on a rising ground, and there awaited the attack of his opponents. After a short but severe conflict, the insurgents were completely defeated, and their leader himself slain—whether by the sword or suffocation from the weight of his armour, in consequence of his extreme corpulency, is uncertain.* Huntly's two sons were made prisoners, and conveyed to Aberdeen. Three days after the battle, Sir John Gordon, the Sir John Gordon, second son, and chief instigator of the rebellion, was beheaded in that city.† Execution and imprisonment of his brother. Huntly's third son, on account of his youth—being then only eighteen—received a pardon. Lord Gordon, the eldest of this unfortunate family, was shortly afterwards apprehended in the south, and, having been brought to his trial, was found guilty of treason. Through the clemency of the queen, his punishment was commuted for imprisonment. On the first meeting of parliament, Huntly's immense estates were confiscated to the crown, the title was forfeited, and "this all-potent house reduced in a moment to insignificance and beggary." There is no doubt that Huntly had meditated the most violent measures against his sovereign. Randolph, in a letter to Cecil, relates that "Sir John Gordon confessed his treasonable designs, but laid the burden of them on his father; that two confidential servants of that nobleman, Thomas Ker and his brother, acknowledged that their master, on three several occasions, had plotted to cut off Moray and Lethington; and that the queen herself, in a conversation with Randolph, thanked God for having delivered her enemy into her hand. She declared," he says, "many a shameful and detestable part that he thought to have used against her, as to have married her where he would, to have slain her brother, and whom other he loved; the place, the times, where it should have been done; and how easy matter it was, if God had not preserved her."*

* "The vale of Corrichie, the scene of this battle, is in the parish of Mid-Mar, amid the mountain scenery of the hill of Farr, which is upwards of two thousand feet above the level of the sea, and the base is described as nearly twenty miles in circumference. The locality is nearly twenty English miles west of Aberdeen, near the rivulet of Corrichie, on the borders of Kincardineshire. An excavation on the side of a rock in the vicinity of the vale is traditionally designated the queen's chair, from the assertion that Mary halted at the spot while returning southward from Aberdeen, and viewed the scene of the then recent engagement. This, however, must be a popular error, for the queen's progress from Aberdeen was by Dunnottar, along the coast to Montrose, whence she passed to Dundee and Perth."—Keith, vol. ii. p. 170. Note by Editor.

On the queen's arrival at the capital from her expedition to the north, she was 21st Nov. 1562. taken ill with a new distemper, which confined her to her room during six days. In the month of December, the Reformer preached a sermon, which was the occasion Knox's account of his second formal interview with the queen. Mary. It appears, from the account of Randolph, that Knox "invighed sore against the queen's dancing, and little exercise of herself in virtue and godliness. The report hereof being brought to her ears, yesterday she sent for him. She talked a long time with him: little thing there was between them of the one or the other, yet did they so depart as that no offence or scandal did arise thereon." Knox himself explains his conduct by saying that the gaiety of the court was occasioned, not only by the news that peace had been restored between France and England, but by letters having been received with the intelligence that "persecution was begun again in France, and that her nobles were beginning to stir their tails, and to trouble the whole realm; upon which he preached against the ignorance, vanity, and despite of princes."† Three accusations were preferred against him: that he had spoken irreverently of the queen—that he had laboured to bring her into hatred and contempt of the people—and that he had exceeded the bounds of his text. Having received a summons from the hands of Alexander Cockburn to attend her majesty to answer for his conduct, he proceeded to court, and was immediately conducted to the royal chamber, where the queen awaited him, surrounded by her ladies and several nobles of the Reformed party, including the Earls of Moray and Morton, and Secretary Lethington. Knox himself has preserved in his 'History' the defence which he made in answer to the above-mentioned accusations. "Madam," said he, "this is all the just recompense which God gives the soldiers of the world—that because they will not hear God speaking to the comfort of the penitent, and for amendment of the wicked, they are often compelled to hear the false report of others, to their great displeasure. I doubt not that it came to the ears of Herod, that our master, Jesus Christ, called him a fox; but they told him not how odious a thing it was before God to murder an innocent, as he had lately done before, causing to behead John the Baptist, to reward the dancing of a harlot's daughter. If the reporters of my words had been honest men, they would have repeated my words, and the circumstances of the same; but because they would have credit at court, and wanting virtue worthy thereof, they needs must have somewhat to please your majesty, if it were but flatteries and lies; but such pleasure, if any your majesty take in such persons, will turn to your everlasting displeasure; for, madam, if your own ears had heard the whole matter that I treated, if there be in you any spark of the spirit of God, yea, of honesty and wisdom, you would not justly have been offended with anything that I spake. And because you have heard their report, please your majesty to hear myself rehearse the same so near as memory will serve. My text, madam, was this—'And now, O kings, understand; be learned, ye judges of the earth.' After I had declared the dignity of kings and rulers, the honour wherein God has placed them, the obedience which is due unto them, being God's lieutenants, I demanded this question: but, Oh, alas! what account shall the most part of princes make before that Supreme Judge, whose throne and authority so manifestly and shamefully they abuse? The complaint of Solomon is this day most true—that violence and oppression do occupy the throne of God here on this earth; for whilst that murderers, bloodthirsty men, oppressors, and malefactors, dare be bold to present themselves before kings and princes, and that the poor saints of God are banished and exiled, what shall we say, but that the devil hath taken possession in the throne of God, which ought to be a dread to all wicked doers, and a refuge to the innocent and oppressed? And how can it be otherwise? For princes will not understand, they will not be learned as God commands them; but they despise God's law, his statutes and holy ordinances they will not understand; for in fiddling and singing they are more exercised than in reading or hearing God's most blessed Word; and fiddlers and flatterers (which commonly corrupt youth) are more precious in their eyes than men of wisdom and gravity, who, by wholesome admonitions, may beat down in them some part of that vanity and pride wherein we are all born, but which in princes takes deep root and strength by evil education. And of dancing, madam, I said that, albeit in Scripture I found no praise of it, and in profane writers that it is termed the gesture of those that are mad and in frenzy than of sober men, yet I do not utterly condemn it, providing that two vices be avoided; the former, that the principal vocation of those that use that exercise be not neglected for the pleasure of dancing; secondly, that they dance not as the Philistines, their fathers, for the pleasure that they take in the displeasure of God's people; for, if they do these, or either of them, they shall receive the reward of dancers, and that will be to drink in hell, unless they repent." "Your words are sharp enough, even now," said Mary, "and yet they were told me in another manner. I know that you and my uncles are not of one religion, and therefore I cannot blame you for conceiving so ill an opinion of them; but, for myself, if you disapprove of ought, come to myself, speak openly, and I shall hear you." "Madam," answered Knox, "I am assured that your uncles are enemies to God, and unto his son Jesus Christ; and for the maintenance of their own pomp and worldly glory, that they spare not to spill the blood of many innocents; and therefore, I am assured, their enterprises shall have no better success than others have had, who before them have done as they do now."

† This distemper appears to have been an acute form of influenza—at least, so we judge from the following description of the symptoms by Randolph:—"It is a pain in the head that hure it, and a soreness in the stomach, with a great cough; it remaineth with some heat, but with the shorter time, as it findeth yet better by the nature of the disease. It is called the 'New Consumption.' The queen kept her bed six days. There was no appearance of danger, nor many that die of this disease, except some of the My Lord of Moray is now presently in it, the Lord of Lethington hath had it, and I am ashamed to say I have been free of it, seeing it is soleth dangerous at all times."—Randolph to Cecil.

On the 25th of December the General Assembly was convened, at which meeting; Meeting of the General Assembly. many complaints were made that "churches lacked ministers; that ministers lacked their stipends; and that wicked men were permitted to be schoolmasters, and so to infect the youth." These complaints had reference to the negligence or avarice of those who had been appointed to collect and distribute the small and inadequate fund appropriated for the maintenance of the clergy. Petitions to the queen were presented, praying for redress of these grievances, but without effect. For the other transactions of this assembly we must refer our readers to that portion of our history which treats of the ecclesiastical affairs of this period.

About this time, Lethington was dispatched to England on a special embassy, Embassy of Lethington to England, Feb. 1563. in consequence of a rumour, that measures were contemplated by the English parliament prejudicial to the interests of the Scottish queen as the nearest heir of Elizabeth. Naturally jealous of an attempt to invalidate her rights, she instructed her secretary "to renew unto our good sister, and reduce to her remembrance all conferences and communications past betwixt our good sister and herself, touching that matter; and shall also enlarge unto her and make manifest the good title and interest we have in the succession of that crown, as nearest and lawful in the right line from King Henry VII., by just descent from his eldest daughter Margaret, sometime Queen of Scots; and desire our good sister that, according to justice and equity, and having respect to the good amity and intelligence presently standing between us, she neither do procure nor suffer to be done anything prejudicial to our aforesaid title."* Lethington was a skilful diplomatist, and, in consequence of his active exertions, no steps were taken by the English parliament in the matter of the succession.

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 191.

Various circumstances combined to press upon the attention of Mary the question of her marriage. Her widowhood had now continued for three years. Her youth and inexperience, the difficulties of her position, the interests of the kingdom, the advice of her councillors, the expressed wishes of her subjects, rendered it apparent that it would be for the advantage of all parties that she should bestow her hand upon one or other of the numerous suitors who then solicited it. Several proposals had been made to this effect. In the summer of the previous year, the Cardinal of Lorraine had made a visit to Ferdinand, the Emperor of Germany, as he was returning home from assisting at the Council of Trent, and had suggested a marriage between Mary and the Archduke Charles, the youngest son of the emperor.* Charles, however, had formerly made overtures of marriage to the Queen of England, and that princess, hearing of the project now mentioned, warned Mary, through her envoy, Randolph, "That if she listened to the Cardinal as to anything relating to that match, it would be the ready way to dissolve the good agreement between Scotland and England, if not to exclude her from any hopes of succeeding to the crown of England; which, that she might not come short of, she warned her, as a friend, to make choice of such an husband out of the English nation, as might be both acceptable to her, and lay the foundation of a firm peace between the two kingdoms at the same time, and secure her succession to the crown, which would never be declared till her choice were publicly known as to this matter."† Cecil also addressed a remonstrance on the subject to the Earl of Moray, who replied that nothing had been yet concluded as to this proposal; but that it was not consistent with her honour to repress the suit of princes, neither to such a course could he advise her, however deeply interested in the continuance of the friendship between the two queens and the mutual love and quietness of their subjects.‡ Besides the offer of the Archduke, proposals for the hand of Mary were made by Philip II. on behalf of his son Don Carlos, Infant of Spain; and by Catherine de Medicis on behalf of the brother of her former husband, the Duke of Anjou. Knox speaks of Lord Robert Dudley and Lord Darnley being also aspirants for the hand of the Scottish queen. It is probable that Mary was prepossessed in favour of a foreign alliance, but two circumstances tended to divert her thoughts from such a marriage. On the one hand, she was desirous of giving effect to the wishes of her own subjects, and these she was fully aware were opposed to any project that would again connect them with a foreign power. They had suffered much from her former marriage with the King of France, and could never forget the miseries entailed upon the country in consequence of the interference of that kingdom with their rights and liberties.

Strong opinions prevailed as to the limitation of the prerogatives of the crown, and a union with a foreign prince would probably lead to an extension of these beyond their ancient bounds. For these and similar reasons, such an alliance as that contemplated with the archduke, would not only be viewed with suspicion and aversion, but be vehemently opposed by the great body of her people. On the other hand, Mary was extremely desirous to consult the wishes of Elizabeth, as it necessarily was her interest to do. We have seen the opinion entertained by the queen of England on the subject of a marriage with the son of the Emperor of Germany. Not content with expressing her dislike to this alliance, she insinuates that Mary's choice of a consort should fall upon one of her own subjects. In somewhat ambiguous terms, she held out a promise, that if her wishes were complied with in this respect, she would take measures for the immediate recognition of her right of succession to the English throne. As this was one of the great objects of Mary's ambition, she appears to have been impressed with the necessity of countering the rival, whom, without the greatest impediment, she could not venture to offend.

A circumstance now occurred which occasioned deep grief to the Scottish queen. Death of the Duke of Guise, who was assassinated during the progress of the civil war which then distressed France. The queen was residing at St. Andrew's when the fatal intelligence was communicated to her. Her attachment to her relative was great, and her sorrow proportionately poignant. The unhappy commotions in France were a source of anxiety and sorrow, and all her influence was employed to restore tranquillity to the Kingdom and to secure the preservation of a peace with England. About this time, also, Envoys of the conduct of a Frenchman named Chastellet, who had arrived from France in the train of Monsieur D'Anville, gave rise to many injurious reports affecting the character of the queen. This person is described as a gentleman of good family, handsome, and accomplished, "a scholar by education, and a poet by choice." Mary, who was passionately fond of music, had shown considerable favour to Chastellet; but whether, as has been insinuated, she gave him "such encouragement as turned the unfortunate man's head," and behaved towards him in a manner unbecoming a woman and a queen, so as to excite his subsequent extravagant conduct, is a point which is not to be hastily decided; and the testimony of Knox is, in our opinion, not sufficient to determine the question. But however this may be, it is certain he received a strong attachment for Mary, and the violence of his passion induced him to commit the offence of concealing himself in her bedchamber. This was in the palace of Holyrood, on the night of the 12th of February; and it is supposed that he armed himself with a sword and dagger. When informed of his conduct on the following morning, the queen, with unfortunate forbearance, no further manifested her displeasure than by commanding him to quit the court. The infatuated Frenchman, however, followed her to Dunfermline, and from thence to Burntisland, where he repeated his audacious conduct by intruding into her apartment at the moment when she was making preparations to retire for the night. His own excuse was, that he wished to clear himself from the former imputation against his conduct. On seeing Chastellet, Mary and her ladies called for help, and their shrieks soon alarmed the royal household. The wretched man was immediately seized, and unhesitatingly acknowledged that he had meditated an attempt on the honour of the queen. Roused to indignation at this insulting confession, Mary commanded Moray, who first came to her assistance, to dispatch the wretch with his dagger. The latter, however, acted a more prudent part, observing that "it would not be for her honour if he were punished in a summary way, but that he should be dealt with according to the laws of the realm." The Earl of Morton, who had succeeded Huntly as Lord Chancellor, the Lord Justice-clerk, Bellenden, and other members of the Privy Council, were summoned from Edinburgh. On the second day after the outrage, Chastellet was tried, condemned, and executed at St. Andrew's on the 22nd of February. Randolph says that he died penitent; and Knox that "he made a godly confession, and granted that his declining from the truth of God and following vanity and impiety was justly recompensed upon him." Somewhat inconsistent with these statements is the fact, that on the scaffold, instead of attending to his religious devotions, he took out of his pocket a volume of Ronsard, and read that French poet's hymn on death, "after which he resigned himself to his fate with gaiety and indifference."* This is a sad story: but we are not disposed to consider the infatuated conduct of Chastellet as traceable to any undue favour which was shown towards him on the part of Mary. Our own ideas of propriety would doubtless condemn her familiarity with the accomplished musician, but we have no reason to believe that it exceeded the limits allowed by the opinions of society as then constituted.† We may safely assume, that up to this period, at least, the character of Mary was such, as it is thus drawn by Sir James Melville: "The queen's majesty, after her returning out of France, behaved herself so princely, so honourably, so discreetly, that her reputation spread in all countries, and she was inclined and determined so to continue in that sort of comeliness unto the end of her life, desiring to hold none in her company but such as were of the best qualities and conversation, abhorring all vices and vicious persons, whether they were men or women."*

While Lethington was absent on his embassy respecting the succession, the Catholics, in defiance of the queen's proclamation, celebrated mass in the houses of many of their adherents. The Bishop of St. Andrew's and the Prior of Whithorn were particularly conspicuous in their violations of the law. No steps having been taken by government for the punishment of the offenders, the Reformers took the law into their own hands, pursued and apprehended several of the priests, and intimated to the Romish clergy that henceforth they should neither complain to queen nor council, but should execute the punishment that God has appointed to idolators in his law by such means as they were able.† These proceedings were naturally obnoxious to Mary, and sending for the Reformer to Lochleven, where she was then residing, she expostulated with him on the conduct of his friends. "She travailed with him earnestly two hours before her supper, that he would be the instrument to persuade the people, and principally the gentlemen of the West, not to proceed to the punishment of any man for the using of themselves in their religion as pleased them." Knox replied by exhorting her to punish malefactors according to the laws. But if she thought to elude the laws, he feared that some one would let the Papists understand that without punishment they should not be suffered so manifestly to offend God's majesty. "Will you," said the queen, "allow that they shall take my sword in their hand?" The Reformer replied that the sword belonged to God, who entrusted it to princes to the end that justice might be done; and if the latter failed to perform it, others must do it for them. Nor would God be offended if men, though neither kings nor magistrates, took it upon them to inflict judgment. "Samuel," said he, "spared not to slay Agag, the fat and delicate king of Amalek, whom Saul had saved; nor did Elias spare Jezebel's prophets, and Baal's priests, although king Ahab stood by. Phineas was no magistrate, but he feared not to strike Zimri and Cosbi. And so, madam, you may see that others than chief magistrates may lawfully punish, and have punished, the vice and crimes that God commands to be punished. Consider," he concluded, "what is the thing your grace's subjects look to receive from your majesty, and what it is you ought to do unto them by mutual contract. They are bound to obey you, and that only in God. You are bound to keep the laws unto them. You crave of them service; they crave from you protection and defence against wicked doers. But if you deny your duty unto them, do you expect to receive full obedience from them? I fear, inadaun, you shall not."‡ These were bold words, but they do not appear to have left an unfavourable impression on the mind of

* Keith, vol. ii. p. 178. Note by Editor.

† The ideas of propriety current in that age were strange enough—for example, Knox himself says, "The queen would lie upon Chastellet's shoulder, and sometimes, privately, she would steal a kiss of his neck. And all this was honest enough, for it was the gentle entreatment of a stranger!"

Mary. The very fearlessness of the undaunted Reformer, who cared nothing for the displeasure of princes, and was anxious only to express his strong convictions, disposed her to receive from his lips what he conceived to be the scriptural exposition of her duty as a queen. On the following day, being desirous of another interview, Mary sent a message to Knox by the hands of Walter Melville, to meet her at Kinross, whither she proposed to go to enjoy the pastime of hawking. Their intercourse on this occasion was of an unusually friendly character. Mary even ventured to tender to the Reformer some excellent advice. He was about to proceed to Dumfries to preside at the election of a superintendent for the surrounding district. Understanding that Alexander Gordon, titular Archbishop of Athens,* was a candidate for that office, she warned him, in a friendly spirit, that the character of that person was not such as to justify his appointment to the proposed office. Knox had reason afterwards, as he himself confesses, to acknowledge the soundness of her counsel.† She then proceeded to inform him that, as regarded their conversation of the day previous, she had resolved to do as he required. "I shall cause all offenders to be summoned, and you shall know that I shall minister justice."‡ Nor did she fail in her performance of this promise; for, as we learn from the "Diurnal of Occurrents," on the 19th of May, a few days before the meeting of parliament, "the Archbishop of St. Andrew's, the Prior of Whithorn, and other Romanists, appeared before Argyle, the Justice General, to answer the charge of having celebrated mass contrary to her majesty's proclamation. The archbishop and the prior (to this indictment having pleaded guilty) were ordered to be imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh during the queen's pleasure, and the rest, having given security for their future obedience, were dismissed."§

The first parliament which had met since Mary's Meeting return into Scotland assembled of parliament. on the 26th of May. The queen determined to open the proceedings in person.

* In consequence of a typographical error in some of the printed copies of Knox's History, Mr. Tytler and others have been led into the mistake of saying that the queen here refers to "the Bishop of Cathness." It is true that in MS. G. we find "the Bishop of Cathness," but the marginal note in that MS. reads correctly "Bishop of Athens." The person referred to is undoubtedly, as stated in the text, Alexander Gordon, titular Archbishop of Athens, afterwards Bishop of Galloway. He joined the Reformers, and still enjoyed his titles; but he was not allowed to exercise his functions as a bishop, nor was his petition acceded to, to be appointed visitor to the churches within his diocese of Galloway. We are indebted for the correction of the above mistake to the valuable notes appended to the edition of Knox's History printed for the Wodrow Society, and edited by David Laing Esq.

The proceedings of the parliament were not of any great importance. The grant of the earldom of Moray to the Lord James was confirmed; the attainder against Kirkaldy of Grange and several of his accomplices in the murder of Cardinal Beaton, was reversed; and the Act of Oblivion, mentioned in the treaty of Edinburgh, received the royal sanction. Mary, however, refused, as before, to grant confirmation of the treaty as a whole, and only gave her consent to the Act of Oblivion in consequence of the urgent entreaties of the Lords, who, it is said, "besought her, on their knees, to allay the jealousies and apprehensions of her subjects by such a gracious law."

On the 28th of May, the queen was obliged to witness a strange and repulsive ceremonial. This was the attainder of the body of the unfortunate Earl of Huntly, which, according to a barbarous custom, had for this purpose been kept undecayed ever since the battle of Corrichie, in the month of October. After the indictment was read, the body was carried into court, in a coffin covered with his escutcheons, when, his treason having been declared proven, the forfeiture was passed, "and the name of the said earl were riven off, and debited forth of memory." †

The Reformers were at this period much scandalised by the licentious manners of the court, and the extravagance of the ladies in the matter of dress. "They spake boldly," says Knox, "against their vanity, and affirmed that the vengeance of God would fall, not only on the English women, but on the whole realm; especially against those that maintained them in that odious showing of things that might have been better hid." His own remonstrances continued to multiply, and were presented to parliament with the view of procuring the enactment of a summary law, which should regulate dress, and provide for the reformation of other abuses. To this great distribution of the preachers these proposals were referred without discussion. A more important measure, however, occupied the attention of Knox; he desired that the question of religion should be formally brought before the three Estates, and that measures should be taken to establish the Protestant faith in the kingdom. In this he was opposed and thwarted by the ministers of Mary, and especially by the Earl of Moray. This conduct on the part of one with whom he had been so long and intimately associated, and who was so much indebted to his power and influence, was extremely painful to the Reformer. He expostulated with the earl, plainly hinting that he was acting from selfish motives; that he dared not introduce the subject of religion, lest his own interests should be compromised; and that the true explanation of his reserve was the fear that confirmation would be refused to his grant of the earldom of Moray. These insinuations exasperated the earl, and he replied to them in terms of great severity. But the Reformer was not a man to remain silent when his conscience prompted him to speak, nor to refrain from administering a rebuke when the most solemn engagements were broken, and that cause for which he had suffered so much was betrayed for the promotion of selfish ambition and personal aggrandisement. In a letter to Moray, he reminded him of their first acquaintance, in what condition he was when they had met in London, and how, since that period, he had been promoted, beyond his own and the expectations of other men, to the chief offices of state. He expressed the sanguine hopes he had once entertained of being assisted by him in the establishment of the truth, and how he was now reluctantly compelled to abandon these hopes. "But seeing," says he, in conclusion, "that I perceive myself frustrate of my expectation, which was, that you should ever have preferred God to your own affection, and the advancement of the truth to your singular commodity, I commit you to your own understanding, and to the conducting of those who can better please you. I praise my God I leave you victor over your enemies, promoted to great honour, and in credit and authority with your sovereign. If you shall long continue so, none within the realm will be more glad than I; but if, after this, you shall decay (as I fear ye shall), then call to mind by what means God exalted you; which was neither by bearing with impiety, nor yet by maintaining of pestilent Papists." This remonstrance was so keenly felt by Moray that for nearly a year and a half he had little communication with the Reformer.*

Notwithstanding the failure of his efforts to procure the establishment of the reformed religion, Knox determined to address some serious admonitions to the nobility, previous to the dissolution of parliament. Accordingly, he delivered from the pulpit a powerful discourse on the mercies of God towards the realm of Scotland, and the ingratitude of the multitude for their deliverance from the cruel tyranny which had oppressed both body and soul. He reminded the

* Knox, vol. ii. p. 382.

Lords that he had been with them in their most desperate trials; that in their greatest extremity he had ever desired them to depend upon God, and in his name had promised them victory and preservation. "I see before me," said he, with that vehemence of voice and action which distinguished the preaching of this extraordinary man, "I see before me St. Johnston, Cupar Muir, and the Craggs of Edinburgh;—yea, in that dark and dolorous night wherein all ye, my lords, with shame and fear, left this town, is still in my mind, and God forbid that I should ever forget it. There is not one of you, against whom death and destruction were threatened, who hath perished in that danger; and how many of your enemies hath God plagued before your eyes? Shall this be your thankfulness to God, to betray his cause, when you have it in your hands to establish it as you please? The queen, you say, will not agree with us. Ask of her that which by God's Word you may justly require, and if she will not agree with you in God, you are not bound to agree with her in the devil. But I see nothing but such a recoiling from Christ, as that the man that first and most speedily flyeth from Christ's ensign holdeth himself most happy." Before concluding his sermon, Knox alluded to the rumours then current in regard to the marriage of the queen. "And now, my lords," said he, "to put an end to all, I hear of the queen's marriage: dukes, brethren to emperors and kings, strive all for the best game. But this, my lords, will I say—note the day, and bear witness hereafter—when ever the nobility of Scotland, who profess the Lord Jesus, consent that an infidel (and all Papists are infidels) shall be head to our sovereign, you do as far as in you lieth to banish Christ Jesus from this realm, and to bring God's vengeance on the country."† Knox tells us that these words, and his manner of speaking them, were judged intolerable. Protestants and Catholics were equally offended; his own friends remonstrated with him on the vehemence of his language. Placemen and flatterers posted to court to give information that Knox had spoken against the queen's marriage. The consequence was, that Mary sent Douglas of Drumlanrig with a summons to the Reformer to appear before her. Introduced into her presence by Erskine of Dun, then superintendent of Angus and Mearns, Mary upbraided him in terms of much severity. She reminded him that in various ways she had courted his favour—that she had not complained of the censures directed against herself and her uncles—that whenever he wished to admonish her she had freely admitted him to an audience. "And yet," said she, "I cannot get quit of you; I avow to God I shall be once revenged." With these words she burst into a passionate fit of weeping. "It is true, madam," said Knox, "your grace and

* Melville says that the Reformer was so vehement in the delivery of this sermon, that "he was like to ding the pulpit in tatters, and flee out of it."

I have been at divers controversies, in the which I never perceived your grace to be offended at me. Without the preaching place, madam, I think few have occasion to be offended at me; and there, madam, I am not master of myself, but must obey him who commands me to speak plain, and to flatter no flesh upon the face of the earth." "But," said the queen, "what have you to do with my marriage? or what are you within this commonwealth?" "A subject born within the same," rejoined the Reformer; "and, albeit, madam, neither earl, lord, nor baron within it; yet has God made me, how abject soever in your eyes, a profitable member within the same. Yea, madam, to me it appertains no less to forewarn of such things as may hurt it, if I foresee them, than it does to any of the nobility; for both my vocation and my conscience crave plainness of me; and therefore, madam, to yourself I say that which I speak in public place: Whosoever that the nobility of this realm shall consent that you be subject to an unfaithful (viz., Catholic) husband, they do as much as in them lieth to renounce Christ, to banish his truth from them, to betray the freedom of this realm, and perchance shall, in the end, do small comfort to yourself."

Words so emphatic and stern could not fail to produce a deep impression upon the youthful queen, and she began again to weep and sob bitterly. Erskine of Dun, "a man of meek and gentle spirit," who was present during the interview, in vain attempted to mitigate her anger. It has often been alleged, from his conduct on this and similar occasions, that the Reformer was but too frequently the hasty ebullition of a petulant temper, and who actually found a cruel satisfaction in exciting the anger and witnessing the tears of his sovereign. Let the following expressions bear witness to the natural warmth-heartedness and even tenderness of Knox's character:—"Madam," said he, in taking his departure, "in God's presence I speak. I never delighted in the weeping of any of God's creatures; yea, I can scarcely well abide the tears of my own boys, whom my own hand corrects, much less can I rejoice in your majesty's weeping. But seeing I have offered you no just occasion to be offended, but have spoken the truth as my vocation craves of me, I must sustain, albeit unwillingly, your majesty's tears, rather than I dare hurt my conscience, or betray the commonwealth through my silence."*

This apology had no effect in appeasing the resentment of the queen, and she ordered Knox instantly to quit the apartment. While waiting in the outer chamber, the nobles of the court shunned him as "one whom men had never seen." But the undaunted Reformer regarded their displeasure with indifference or contempt, and turning to the ladies of the queen's household, who were sitting near attired in their richest dresses, he said, "O, fair ladies! how pleasant were this life of yours, if it should always abide, and thus in the end that we might pass to heaven with all this gay gear. But, fie upon that knave Death, that will come, whether we will or not; and where he has laid on his arrest, the foul worms will be busy with this flesh, be it never so fair and so tender; and the silly soul, I fear, shall be so foolish, that it can neither carry with it gold, garnishing, trappings, pearl, nor precious stones." In the midst of this conversation, the superintendent came out of the queen's apartment, and informed Knox that he was allowed to go home until her majesty had taken further advice. Her attendants persuaded her to abandon the idea of prosecuting the Reformer for this interference with her marriage, "and so that storms quiet in appearance, but never in the heart."

Parliament being now dissolved, Mary resolved to undertake a progress through the Highlands. She left Edinburgh, ^{on the 29th of June, and proceeded} on the 29th of June, and proceeded to Linlithgow, where she spent the night. From Linlithgow she passed to Glasgow, where she remained during fourteen days. Several castles were made to Hamilton, Paisley, and other places in the neighbourhood. On the 23rd day of July, she proceeded to Inverary, for the purpose of visiting her sister, the Countess of Argyll. Crossing the Clyde, she spent a short time at the residence of the Earl of Eglinton. On leaving Ayrshire, she passed on to Dumfries, where she had a month, and then returned to Edinburgh, after an absence of between two and three months. She remained in the capital for eight days, and then withdrew to Stirling.

In the meantime, a riot occurred in Edinburgh, occasioned by the manner in which the ^{Mass was celebrated in the chapel} mass was celebrated in the chapel ^{of Holyrood.} of Holyrood. The absence of the ^{queen had emboldened the Catholics to give greater publicity to their obnoxious proceedings.} queen had emboldened the Catholics to give greater publicity to their obnoxious proceedings. It appears, from the account of Knox, that on those days when the sacrament was dispensed in the town, great numbers of the Papists resorted to the abbey, to engage in the administration of their faith. Much scandalised, the Reformers determined that certain of the brethren distinguished by their piety and zeal should be sent to the entrance of the chapel, in order to learn the doctrine of those who attended the services. Not content to obey their instructions, they imprudently attempted to enter the abbey, in which they were opposed, and a riot immediately ensued. Several succeeded in gaining admittance, and amongst the rest one Patrick Cranstoun, who, finding the altar covered, and the priest preparing to celebrate mass, ^{was} ^{very} ^{indignant} ^{and} ^{demanded} ^{him} ^{to} ^{desist} ^{from} ^{that} ^{administration,} ^{saying} [—] "The queen's majesty is not here! how dare they then be so misapert as openly to proceed against the law!"* The arrival of the lord of ^{the} ^{court,} with the provost and several of the council, put an end to the disturbance. Two of the rioters were seized, and a day appointed for their trial. Knox himself was much disturbed by this event. Considering them sufferers in a righteous cause, he determined, if possible, to secure them from the consequences of their conduct. For this purpose, he issued circular letters, to the effect that all who professed the true religion, or were concerned for its preservation, should assemble at Edinburgh on the day of trial, that by their presence they might comfort and assist their distressed brethren. Through the treachery of some of his pretended friends, one of these letters fell into the queen's hands. Its contents afforded an opportunity to his adversaries to compass his destruction. His attempt to assemble the subjects of the sovereign without her sanction was regarded as an act of treason, and it was resolved to prosecute Knox before the Privy Council. His trial took place on the 15th of December, and a full account of its proceedings is recorded in his History. The result was, that, after a long hearing, he was fully and unanimously acquitted. It is somewhat remarkable that this decision, much to the displeasure of the queen, was acquiesced in by the zealous Catholic, Sinclair, Bishop of Ross, and President of the Court of Session.*

The marriage of Mary was at this time a subject of great anxiety to the English sovereign. She was under considerable apprehension that the Scottish queen might contract an alliance with a foreign prince. It is not improbable that intrigues for this purpose were then secretly agitated, both in Scotland and on the Continent. The importance of obtaining such a husband for the queen was apparent to the Catholics. It was the only circumstance which afforded them the slightest prospect of regaining their lost ascendancy. Catherine de Medicis, in particular, was sensible of this. That princess had acted a most ungenerous part towards her royal relative. Soon after the death of the Duke of Guise, she had shown her dislike to the Scottish queen by stopping the payment of the dowry to which she was entitled as the widow of Francis II., by depriving the Duke of Chatelherault of his pension, and by bestowing on a Frenchman the command of the Scottish guards. Jealous, however, of the intimacy which she now perceived to subsist between Elizabeth and Mary, she changed her policy, and employed all her art to conciliate the latter princess. The arrears of her dowry were paid up, with the promise, that future payments would be more punctually tendered. She made Mary warm professions of friendship, and was extremely liberal in her offers of service.

The queen of England had her own views with regard to Mary's choice of a consort. She had frequently expressed her determination to oppose with all her influence an alliance with a foreign potentate. Her sentiments on this point are forcibly described in a document entitled, "A memorial of certain matters committed to our servant, Thomas Randolph, sent to our good sister, the Queen of Scots, twentieth August, 1563." In this paper she writes, "The seeking of a husband for our sister is honourable and convenient for her, and a thing that we like very well in her, although hitherto we have not found such disposition in ourself; remitting, nevertheless, our mind and heart to be directed by God, as it shall best please Him, for his honour and the weal of our realm. But this herein we consider, that to seek such a husband, as we will many ways perceive is sought for in the emperor's lineage, by her uncle, the Cardinal of Lorraine, of whose former practices against us we have had good experience, must needs bring a manifest danger to our private amity; an apparent occasion to dissolve the concord that is presently between our nations; and thirdly, an interruption of such a course, as otherwise might be taken to further and awake such title or right as she might have to succeed us in this crown, if we should depart without issue of our body."* But Elizabeth was prepared to interfere much further in this marriage than is apparent from the language we have just quoted. She wished, in fact, if not to dictate, at least to suggest the person, whom she considered a suitable consort for the Scottish sovereign. In her own mind, she had fixed upon her favourite, Leicester, then Lord Robert Dudley,† and without immediately proposing him for the acceptance of Mary, she instructed Randolph to sound her inclinations, and confer upon the subject with Moray and Lethington. Randolph was not for the present to speak of Dudley, but only, "if she shall press upon you, what kind of marriage you think might best content us and our realm, you may well say, you can but wish that there might be found some noble person of good birth within this our realm that might be agreeable to her." Randolph was by no means pleased with the task which was thus assigned him. It is probable, indeed, that he entertained suspicions of the sincerity of his royal mistress in her

Her insincerity. expressed intention of bestowing upon Dudley the hand of the Scottish queen. Considering the extraordinary favour which she had shown towards that courtier, the partiality and even affection with which he had been long regarded, he conceived it impossible, from her well-known character and dispositions, that she should be really willing to unite him in marriage with one whom she looked upon as her rival, and on this account both disliked and feared. His sentiments in this respect were thus forcibly expressed in a letter to Cecil: "To persuade the queen of Scotland," he remarks, "to marry any man under the rank of a prince, would be a dangerous and dishonourable task for any subject to adventure; and even if

Mary was ready to forget her royal dignity, and listen for a moment to the proposal of Elizabeth, there remained a greater difficulty behind. In offering the noblest in England, none could be at a loss to divine who was meant. But how unwilling the queen's majesty herself would be to depart from him (that is from Dudley), and how hardly his mind would be divorced or drawn from that worthy room where it is placed, let any man see, where it cannot be thought but it is so prized for ever, that the world would judge worse of him than of any living man, if he should not rather yield his life than alter his thoughts. Therefore thus, both Moray and Lethington conclude, as well for her majesty's part, as for him who is so happy to be so far in her grace's favour, that if this queen would wholly put herself into Elizabeth's will, as to receive a husband of her selecting, either she should not have the best, or, at least, match herself with him that hath his mind placed already elsewhere; or if it can be withdrawn from thence, she shall take a man unworthy, from his disloyalty and inconstancy, to marry with any, much less with a queen. Whereupon they, knowing both their affections and judging them inseparable, think rather that no such thing is meant on my sovereign's part, and that all these offers bear a greater show of goodwill than any good meaning.*

After considerable delay, Randolph received permission to diselose to Mary the name of the nobleman whom Elizabeth proposed as her consort. This communication was heard by the queen with surprise and displeasure. The ambassador having urged her to come to a decision as soon as possible, Mary replied that his own mistress had been long enough of coming to a decision; "and you know she hath counselled me to have regard to three points, whereof the special one was honour. Now, think you, Master Randolph, that it will be honourable in me to imbase my state and marry one of her subjects? Is this conformable to her promise to use me as her sister or daughter—to advise me to marry my Lord Robert—to ally myself with her own subject?" In order to reconcile her to the intended match, Randolph artfully represented to her the advantages which would result to the respective kingdoms, and in particular stimulated her personal ambition, by reminding her of the assurances formerly given by Elizabeth, that her right of succession to the crown of England would, on the consummation of this union, be formally acknowledged. To this, however, it was reasonably objected by Mary, that she had no guarantee that these promises would be faithfully observed. "Where," said she, "is my assurance in this? What if the queen, your mistress, should marry herself and have children? What, then, have I gotten? and who will say I have acted wisely in taking this step, which requires long consideration, on so sudden a proposal as this? I have conferred with no one; and although willing not to obstruct your mistress, the adventure is too great." All that she would consent to was, that Randolph should mention the proposal to Moray, Lethington, and Arryn. This having been done, it was answered by those noblemen, that the arrangement might be taken into consideration, but, in the meantime, no definite reply could be given.* The conduct of Elizabeth in these transactions appears to have been characterised by the duplicity which marked all her negotiations with the Queen of Scotland. From the very first she had been jealous of Mary. The fame of her accomplishments and beauty gave birth to envious and ungenerous feelings. The relationship in which the Scottish queen stood to herself, and her consequent nearness to the throne—the unfortunate and precipitate manner in which her claims had been set forth and pressed on the attention of the world—the imprudent assumption by Mary and her husband of the arms of England, and the conduct of her friends and partisans in France—had all exerted a fatal influence on the suspicious temper and fretful disposition of the English queen, and moved her to the adoption of unjust measures, and the employment of most sordid artifices to counteract the schemes of her dangerous opponent. Three years had now elapsed since the return of Mary to her own kingdom, and while many negotiations had been entered into on the subject of her marriage—in every point of view a desirable event—nothing as yet had been definitely concluded. In deference to the wishes of her royal sister, she had refused to entertain many advantageous offers from illustrious suitors, and even consented to sacrifice her own undoubted pretensions in favour of a foreign alliance. Indeed by the urgent representations of Elizabeth, and flattered into compliance with her wishes by the promise of having her right of succession to the crown acknowledged and legalised by parliament, she had promised to be guided in her selection of a consort by the advice of her royal sister, and had, in consequence, been subjected to most humiliating treatment—forced, as it were, to wait upon the pleasure of the Queen of England, who made a party by insufferably tedious negotiations, protracted month after month, and ending at last in a proposition which was offensive, both as apparently compromising her dignity as a sovereign, and as being unlikely to be carried into effect. It was the result of all these tedious negotiations which angered and disgusted Mary. Elizabeth, she felt, would never consent to part from Dudley. The latter would naturally be averse to a union which must for ever terminate his hopes of a still more illustrious alliance. Thus Mary found herself required to acquiesce in a proposal which was neither seriously entertained by the person who made it, nor even agreeable to the ambitious suitors who was proposed for her acceptance.

Character of Elizabeth's policy at this period.

* MS. Letter, State Paper Office, 2nd March, 1564.

The insincerity of Elizabeth throughout the whole transactions was rendered painfully apparent in their conclusion. Mary had been her dupe: she could not but feel that her own amiable feelings and sanguine anticipations had been artfully turned to advantage by the more experienced and unscrupulous queen. It appears, from this conduct, not improbable that Elizabeth designed to prevent her rival from entering into any matrimonial engagements, and thereby best furthering her own wishes. There can be no doubt of her strong repugnance to allow the recognition of Mary's rights. Many professions to the contrary were indulged in, but the conduct she pursued satisfactorily demonstrated their insincerity. If really entertaining an aversion to that recognition, she would naturally be desirous of rendering it unacceptable to the English people. One very obvious way of accomplishing this end would be to keep the queen of Scotland unmarried. With a greater plausibility she could then absolutely refuse to sanction, through a decision of the legislature, the acknowledgment of Mary's claims. She dared not, indeed, openly promulgate these views, nor discover her deliberate intention of frustrating the matrimonial projects entertained by her sister and approved of universally by her people. The injustice and cruelty of such a design would be too apparent. But measures which a regard to her own character prevented her from publicly avowing were, nevertheless, covertly adopted and assiduously pursued. Mary was successfully diverted from a foreign alliance. She accepted the friendly offices of Elizabeth in the selection of a consort. She was kept for a long period in a state of anxiety and suspense; and at the end of three years her marriage, after having been the subject of most flattering overtures from some of the greatest princes in Europe, was so far from being consummated, that it was even more unsettled than it was on the day in which she landed from France. Such was the policy of Elizabeth, and such even at this time its unsatisfactory and pernicious results.

The opinion of the advisers of Mary as to this policy of "delay, mystery, and caprice," is very clearly given in the following communication from Lethington to Cecil: "If," said he, "a conjunction be really meant, and you will prosecute the means to draw it on which were opened up by the queen my mistress's last answer, I doubt not but you will find conformity enough on this part; but if time be always driven without farther effect than hath yet followed upon any message which hath passed between them these three years, I am of opinion he shall in the end think himself most happy, who hath least meddled in the matter. Gentle letters, good words, and pleasant messages, be good means to begin friendship amongst princes; but I take them to be too slender bands to hold it fast. In these great causes between our sovereigns, I have ever found that fault with you, that as in your letters you always wrote obscurely, so in private communications you seldom uttered your own judgment: you might well more dispute in utramque partem academico, leaving me in suspense to collect what I could. So, I fear, in giving advice you will walk so warily, rather being intent to speak nothing that may at any time thereafter hurt yourself, than to speak all things that might further the matter; and I will confess I have of late enforced my natural disposition to learn this same lesson of you, for the reverence I bear you, that your manner of doing serves me for instruction to direct my proceedings. Marry, I fear the common affairs do not fare a whit the better for our too great wariness."*

The inconsistency of Elizabeth in all matters connected with her policy towards Scotland, is strikingly shown in her conduct on the occasion of the return to his own country of the outlawed Lennox. This nobleman, having been kindly received at the English court, had long importuned the queen to interpose on his behalf, and procure for him a permission to present himself before his sovereign. To this she graciously acceded; and, in compliance with her earnest recommendation, the desired permission, given under the great seal, was dispatched to Lennox. When all the preparations for his return, under the most favourable auspices, were completed, Elizabeth, with a capriciousness which is wholly unaccountable, repented the part she had taken in promoting his restoration; and, exerting her influence for the detention of Lennox in England, took immediate steps for prejudicing Mary against him, and revoked the permission already given under the most solemn sanctions. To this effect, Moray and Lethington were both addressed by Secretary Cecil. But so far from complying with the extraordinary demands expressed in his communications, they replied in terms of such marked severity as to give serious offence to the English queen and her minister. The only conceivable explanation of Elizabeth's conduct is the circumstance that the return of Lennox, on account of his supposed Catholic tendencies, was viewed with much alarm by the Protestant party. Strong representations to this effect were made in a letter to Randolph by Knox; and these, being communicated to his mistress, formed the plausible ground of the sudden alteration in her conduct. In regard to this change, the answer of Lethington to Cecil is worthy of being quoted. He observes, that the steps which he had taken in the matter were adopted solely in compliance with the expressed wishes of the English queen. "It is therefore," he continues, "not a little marvellous, seeing how earnestly her majesty did recommend unto me my Lord of Lennox's cause and my lady's, at my last being in that court. Nay, suddenly, after I had taken my leave, you yourself, at her majesty's commandment, did send after me by post her letters to the queen's majesty, my mistress, very affectionate in their favour, willing mo to present the same with recommendation from the queen. And now," he continues, "having once, under the great seal, permitted him liberally to come, it will be a hard matter to persuade her majesty to revoke it; and I dare little presume to enter into any such communication with her majesty, knowing how much she doth respect her honour where promise is once passed, and how unwilling she is to change her deliberations being once resolved; which, as she will not do herself, so doth she altogether mistake in all others."

With respect to the danger to the Protestant cause, which some apprehended from the return of Lennox, Lethington gives a very decided opinion. "The religion here," he says, "doth not depend upon my Lord of Lennox's coming, neither do those of the religion hang upon the sleeves of any one or two that may mislike his coming. For us, whether he come or not come, I take it to be no great matter, up or down. Marry, that the stay should grow upon the queen majesty's side here, it should somewhat touch her majesty in honour, having once permitted his license so freely."* Moray also, in Moray's letter a letter to Cecil, of the same date, to Cecil. and arising out of the same circumstances, observes:—"As to the faction that his coming might make for the matters of religion, thanks to God, our foundation is not so weak that we have cause to fear if he had the greatest subject of this realm joined to him, seeing we have the favour of our prince and liberty of conscience in such abundance as our hearts can wish. It will neither be he nor I, praised be God, can hinder or alter religion here away; and his coming or remaining in that cause will be to small purpose."†

Elizabeth having failed in making any effectual opposition to the return of Lennox, reluctantly desisted from her efforts; and, acting a strangely inconsistent part, actually furnished the earl with strong letters of recommendation to the Scottish queen. Mary was absent on a progress which she had undertaken into the northern parts of her dominions when Lennox † arrived in Edinburgh, on the 4th of September, 1564.

‡ It may be well in this place to remind the reader of the circumstances which led to the long banishment of Lennox, who was forced to reside in exile for a period of twenty years. After having served in France in a military capacity, he returned to Scotland in the year 1543. This was subsequent to the death of James V. In 1544, he was obliged to abandon the kingdom, in consequence of his intrigues with the English, and his advocacy of the proposed marriage between the youthful Mary and Edward VI. In the month of June of the same year, he signed a secret agreement with Henry VIII., and soon afterwards was dispatched to Scotland with an armament of ships and men. During a residence at Carlisle in the following winter, he engaged in a treasonable correspondence with the Earl of Glencairn and others of the nobility; for which treason sentence of forfeiture was pronounced against him, in a parliament held at Linlithgow, in October, 1545. From that time to the period of his recall, he resided in England. He was connected with the royal family both of Scotland and England. He married Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter

On hearing of the earl's arrival, she immediately returned to Holyrood. Before, however, he could be admitted to an audience with the queen, it was necessary that the sentences of excommunication which had been pronounced against him should be formally rescinded. This process is described in the 'Journal of Occurrences' as follows:—"On the 2nd day of September, Matthew, sometime Earl of Lennox, was by open proclamation, at the Market Cross of Edinburgh, relaxed from the process of our sovereign lady's horns, by Sir Robert Forrester, of Luthrie, Knight Lion-King of Arms, and all the officers, delivering the wand of peace to John, Earl of Atholl, who received the same in the said earl's name. The earl was then invited to court, and in obedience to this command, presented thither with a splendid retinue. Judging on knowledge to the abbey, he was accompanied by a number of twelve gentlemen, clothed in black livery as the velvet, "with chains about their waists, and necks and mounted upon four horses." Indeed him rode thirty of his retainers, clothed in a livery of grey. Arriving at Holyrood, he was conducted to the lodging which had been most liberally prepared for him, in the house of Mary's uncle, the Lord Robert, Commendator of the Palace. He was then admitted into the presence of the queen, who received him with great kindness, and even affection.

Lennox having delivered to Mary the letters of recommendation with which Elizabeth had favoured him, the queen dispatched a letter to her sister of England, in which she assured her that, in compliance with her request, she was willing to show the earl every kindness, "and that she had not only by her reception given him some part of her goodwill, but also intended to proceed further to his full restitution, whereby he should be able to enjoy the privileges of a subject, the liberty of his native country, and his old title." It appears from an interesting letter of Randolph's, that the earl's establishment was conducted on a scale of great magnificence, and that his hospitality was of an extensive and costly character. As it cannot be supposed that his means, when he arrived in Scotland, could support so lavish an expenditure, it is probable that Mary fulfilled her promise to Elizabeth, by bestowing upon him such an amount of money as enabled him to make those arrangements without inconvenience to himself. "I dined with my Lord Lennox," says Randolph, "being by his request in the morning. I found nothing less than the best furniture and furniture of his lodging. There you have hath heard by report: the house his apartments well hanged; two chambers, very well furnished; one special rich chamber, and a fair bed, where his lordship doth himself; and of the Princess Margaret, Queen of France, and sister of Henry VIII. by her second husband, the Earl of Angus; and by this marriage, she was the father of Lord Lennox, who was the second son of Henry VII. of England, the second son of Queen Elizabeth, and the cousin (by half-blood only) of Queen Mary of Scotland.

a passage made through the wall, to come the next way into court when he will. I see him honourably used of all men, and that the queen's self hath good liking of his behaviour. There dined with him the Earl of Atholl, in whom he reposes a singular trust, and they are seldom asunder, saving when the Earl of Lennox is at the sermon. There was also his brother, the Bishop of Caithness, a Protestant, who sometimes preacheth. His lordship's cheer is great, and his household many, though he hath dispatched divers of his train away. He findeth occasion to disburse his money very fast; and of his £700 brought with him, I am sure that much is not left. If he tarry long, Lennox may, perchance, be to him a dear purchase. He gave the queen a marvellous fair and rich jewel, whereof there is made no small account; a cloek and a dial, curiously wrought and set with stones; and a looking-glass, very rich set with stones in the four metals; to my Lord of Lethington, a very fair diamond in a ring; to my Lord of Atholl another, as also somewhat to his wife—I know not what; to divers others somewhat; but to my Lord Moray nothing. He presented also each of the Marys with such pretty things as he thought fittest for them; such good means he hath to win their hearts, and to make his way to farther effect. The bruit is here, that my lady herself, and my Lord of Darroley, are coming after, insomuch that some have asked me if she were upon the way. This I find, that there is here marvellous good liking of the young lord, and many that desire to have him here."

In the month of October, Mary carried out her intentions, expressed in the letter to Elizabeth, with regard to the restoration of Lennox to his titles and estates. Proclamation was made at the Market Cross of Edinburgh, that the earl was restored to his "lands, heritage, and good fame;" and that the doom of forfeiture pronounced upon him was revoked and rescinded. Full effect, however, was not given to this proclamation till the 6th of December, on which day a parliament was convened for the passing of the necessary measures. The proposed restoration of the honours and estates of the house of Lennox was vehemently opposed by its ancient enemy, the Duke of Chatelherault. That nobleman declared that the loss of his estates was a smaller punishment than the treason of Lennox merited, and that his return to his native land would be followed by consequences fatal to the happiness of the queen and the prosperity of the realm. On the arrival of Lennox, the duke had refused to see him; but on the 27th of October, we are told they were brought together "in our sovereign lady's palace of Holyrood, and finally agreed by our sovereign lady and the lords of her council, and shook hands together, and drank every one to the other."† This reconciliation, however, was of brief duration. Before a week had elapsed, the duke and Lennox quarrelled in the presence of the queen, who severely reprimanded them on account of their disrespectful and violent conduct, and assured them she would take part against the one who presumed to enter first into a fresh strife.

When parliament was convened, in the month of December, the duke refused to at- Restored to his titles and estates.

Tolbooth, for the purpose of opening the proceedings, the crown was carried by the Earl of Moray, the sceptre by the Earl of Atholl, and the sword of state by the Earl of Crawford. The queen, in her address, explained the object for which the three Estates were assembled, and desired that a measure should be passed in accordance with her wishes. Lethington, her Secretary of State, in a speech of great power, then set forth the claims of Lennox to the favourable consideration of parliament. He dwelt strongly on the fact of the noble ancestry of Lennox, his connection with the royal family, and his near relationship to the queen, by his marriage with her aunt. He expatiated on the policy of attending, in this matter, to the recommendation of Elizabeth, and giving effect to her wishes; and urged them also to respect the feelings of their own sovereign, who, he observed, "as we have heard from her own report, has a great deal more pleasure to be the instrument of the upholding, maintenance, and advancement of the ancient blood, than to have matter ministered of the decay and overthrow of any good race." No opposition appears to have been offered in this assembly to the proposed measure, and Lennox was accordingly reinstated in the honours and estates of his ancient house. In a speech made on this occasion by Maitland of Lethington, there occurs the following striking tribute to the character of the Scottish queen, which may be appropriately quoted in this connection:—"As, by her majesty's prudence, we enjoy this present peace with all foreign nations, and quietness among yourselves, in such sort as, I think, justly it may be affirmed, Scotland in no man's age that presently lives was in greater tranquillity, so it is the duty of all of us, her loving subjects, to acknowledge the same as a most high benefit, proceeding from the good government of her majesty, declaring ourselves thankful, and rendering to her majesty such due obedience as a just prince may look for at the hands of faithful and obedient subjects. A good proof have we all in general had of her majesty's benignity, these three years that she has lived in the government over you; and many of you have largely tasted of her large liberality and frank dealing—the many notable examples of her clemency, above others her good qualities, which ought to move them to the abhorrence of all bruits and rumours (which are the most pestilent evils that can be in any commonwealth), and the inventors and sowers thereof."*

It may not be improper to mention, that on the queen's proceeding a second time from the abbey to the Tolbooth, to give her sanction to the acts which restored Lennox to his honours, the Duke of Chatelherault was persuaded to occupy the place to which he was entitled by his rank, and to carry the crown before her majesty.

The tortuous and contradictory policy of the perplexity queen of England, in regard to of Elizabeth. Mary's marriage and the return of Lennox, is very strikingly illustrated by a letter which she at this time wrote with her own hand to the Secretary of State. Considering, as she did, that her interests demanded the detention of Lennox in her own dominions, and having laboured, but without effect, to accomplish this end, she had virtually condemned her policy, and compromised herself, by furnishing the earl with a letter of recommendation to the Scottish queen. The reception which he met with, the favours lavished upon him, his restoration to rank and fortune, filled her with alarm, and rendered her perplexed and anxious. In this difficult position she had recourse to Cecil, and threw upon that able and adroit minister the responsibility of extricating her from the dilemma in which she had been placed by her own rash and inexplicable policy. Confined at this time to her chamber by temporary indisposition, she addressed the secretary in the following extraordinary terms:—"I am involved in such a labyrinth in regard of the reply to the letter of the Queen of Scots, that I know not how I can satisfy her, having delayed all this time sending her any answer, and now really being at a total loss what I must say. Find me out some good excuse, which I may plead in the dispatches to be given to Randolph, and let me know your opinion in this matter."*

The results of the secretary's deliberation on this important matter, are expressed at great length in a document entitled, "A Memorial for Thomas Randolph,† being sent to the Queen of Scots, in message from the queen's majesty, 4th October, 1564." These instructions are written in a confused and, at times, unintelligible manner, and, instead of supplying Randolph with any satisfactory excuses to account to Mary for the manner in which an answer to her letters had been delayed, they insinuate that this delay was wholly owing to the conduct of the Scottish queen and certain noblemen of her court. "But, behold," says this memorial, "upon a just occasion given us to write a letter somewhat before this time to our said sister, for a matter concerning the Earl of Lennox coming thither, we received in that unreasonable time an answer from our sister much different from our desert and expectation; and therewithal we did see some letters from the Laird of Lethington to some of ours in the same matter, of a stranger nature than had ever come to our knowledge before, using some sharper words in disallowing of our request than was reasonable in such an argument, whereas our dealing was such, as, although we had not thanks for our care, had to the request of our said sister and her country, yet we did not look to have our friendly considerations repurposed or reprehended." She then goes on to say, that this manner of writing was the occasion of much perplexity and doubt as to what new designs might be cherished on the part of Mary; and that, sometimes being of one opinion and sometimes of another, she had at last concluded that it was safer and more expedient to delay her answer till such time as further intelligence reached her from the Scottish court.

About this time, Mary dispatched to England, on a mission of importance, the Sir James Melville, accomplished Sir James Melvil, a vfr. gentleman educated in the house of the Constable Montmorency, and long resident at the court of France. Melvil was a Protestant, and this was probably one of the grounds of his selection for the office to which he was now appointed. His instructions were clear and explicit. The arrival and reception of Lennox had occasioned a slight interruption in the friendly intercourse and correspondence of the two queens, and had given rise in the mind of Elizabeth to feelings of uneasiness and irritation. She felt, in fact, that her conduct was ridiculous as well as inexplicable; and, keenly sensible of her anomalous position, and of the just cause to which she had exposed herself, she took refuge in an affected displeasure and an assumed sense of injury. Melvil was instructed to affect by every means a reconciliation, to offer any explanations that might be necessary or expedient, and to re-establish the good understanding between the two queens on its old and satisfactory basis. He was advised to be as much as possible in company with the queen, to hold with her confidential discourses, "to mingle merry discourses with business, and to gain her familiar ear; to discover, if possible, her real intentions on the subject of the marriage, and to keep a strict and jealous eye upon any measures which might be contemplated regarding Mary's right of succession to the English crown."

On arriving in London, Melvil was crowded with many marks of attention from Lord Robert Dudley, who sent him a magnificent present, in the shape of a horse and a mantle, richly ornamented with gold. His introduction to Elizabeth took place in the garden of her palace. The first inquiry of the queen was concerning the letter which had been sent by Mary, "with," she said, "sent in English language, that she believed all friendship and familiarity had been given up; and that she was minded never to write again, unless it was another letter just as spiteful." This letter, it seems, she had already prepared, "which," adds Melvil, "she took out of her pouch to let me see, adding, that the only reason why she had not sent it was, that it was too gentle; so that she delayed till she could write one more vehement in answer to the Queen of Scot's angry bill—viz. billet." Melvil had confessedly a difficult part to play in this somewhat trying interview, but he acted with surprising tact and consummate adroitness. Pretending to be unable to understand how his sovereign could have written to so mighty a princess

His ingenious defence of Mary. in a style so strongly reprehended by her majesty, Elizabeth, in order to satisfy him that she had not exaggerated, placed in his hands the letter she had termed spiteful. On receiving and examining it, the subtle courtier observed, that, considering the terms of familiarity in which they stood towards each other, he was unable to discover anything offensive in its language; and that whatever she had judged to the contrary was a misapprehension on her part, to be accounted for by her comparative ignorance of the French idioms! "Fox," says he, "although her majesty could speak as good French as any that had never been out of this country, yet that she lacked the use of the French court language, which was frank and short, and had oftentimes two significations, which discreet and familiar friends always took in the best part. He prayed her, therefore, to destroy the angry letter which she had thought to send to the queen by way of revenge, and he would never let her know that her true, plain meaning had been so misconstrued." The queen, he adds, having been convinced by this plausible explanation, destroyed, in his presence, both the letter of Mary and her own angry epistle, and promised that henceforth she would put the best and most liberal construction on the sayings and doings of her good sister.*

At a subsequent stage of this interview, we find Elizabeth giving expression to her sentiments on the subject of the disputed question of the succession, and the marriage of Mary with Lord Robert Dudley. She inquired of Melvil "if the Queen of Scots had sent any answer to the proposition of marriage made to her by Randolph?" To this he replied, that his sovereign had not, as yet, given much consideration to the subject; but that she contemplated with satisfaction the approaching meeting of the commissioners on the Borders; to which meeting she proposed to send, on her part, Secretary Lethington and the Earl of Moray, and trusted that her majesty would fulfil her promise of sending the Earl of Bedford and

Elizabeth on this observed, that Melvil appeared to make small account of my Lord Robert, by naming the Earl of Bedford before him; but ere long she would make him a greater earl, and that Melvil should see it done before returning home; for she esteemed the Lord Robert as her brother and best friend, whom she would have married herself, if she had been minded to take a husband. But being determined to end her life in virginity, she wished that the queen, her sister, should marry him, as meetest of all other, and with whom she might find it in her heart to declare her next in the succession to her realm than with any other person; for, being matched with him, she would not then fear any attempts at usurpation during her own life, "being assured that he was so trusty and loving, that he would never give his consent, nor suffer such a thing to be enterprised in her time."* These sentiments and professions, whether sincere or not—and this is a question to be decided by comparing them with her past and subsequent conduct—were at least in consistency with those formerly expressed to different parties.

Melvil had every reason to be satisfied with his reception at the English court, and with the facilities afforded him for holding confidential and prolonged intercourse with the queen. He assures us that he was favourably and familiarly used, and that, during the nine days he remained at court, her majesty was pleased to confer with him every day, and sometimes thrice a day—"before noon, after noon, and after supper." On one occasion, taking him into her bed-chamber, she showed him some small miniatures, wrapped up in paper, on which was written, in her own hand, the name of the originals. On the first that she had taken up was written "My Lord's picture." Melvil, having his attention attracted towards it, importuned her to allow him to inspect it. This she was at first unwilling to do, as it had been a present from her favourite, Leicester. At length she yielded, and, having greatly admired the portrait, he begged to be allowed to carry it to his royal mistress. "Nay," said the queen, "I have but that one." "True," replied the courtier; "but," looking significantly towards the earl, who stood conversing with Cecil at the further end of the chamber, "your majesty possesses the principal." She then took out from her eseritoire another picture, which, having kissed with every appearance of affection, she put it into the hands of Melvil. It was the likeness of his sovereign, and the ambassador kissed her hand, "for the great love I saw she bore to the queen." He asked her to send this, or the picture of my lord, as a token to his queen. She answered, "that if his queen would follow her counsel, she would get both in time, and all that she had; but that she would send her a diamond by him."

It has been well remarked, that the lively account which Sir James Melvil has left us in his memoirs of his residence at the English court, presents us with the best portrait of Elizabeth, "as a woman," which has been ever given to the world. The extreme vanity and jealous disposition of this princess, who could not brook the idea that her own charms were surpassed, or even equalled, by those of her sister of Scotland, are amusingly exhibited in one of the many conversations which Melvil was privileged to hold with this renowned queen. Elizabeth inquired of him what kind of colour of hair was reputed to be best—whether the queen's hair or her own were best, and which of the two was the fairest. To this he answered, "that the fairness of both was not their worst fault." She desired, however, to know which of them was the fairest? "I said she was the fairest queen in England, and ours the fairest queen in Scotland." A gallant and most courtier-like reply. She still pressed her inquiry; and, to free himself from this importunity, Melvil at last admitted "that they were the fairest ladies in their courts—that the Queen of England was whiter, but our queen was very lusome." She further inquired, which of them was of the highest stature? "Our queen," said Melvil. "Then," said Elizabeth, "she is over high, for that she was herself neither over high nor over low!" She asked next, whether Mary played well? "Reasonably well," said he, "for a queen." The next day, Elizabeth gave him an opportunity of judging of her skill in performing on the virginals, without, however, appearing to make a studied exhibition of her powers. After dinner, he says, Lord Hunsdon drew him aside into a quiet gallery, where he might hear some music, the instrument being the virginals, and the performer the queen herself. After listening in this stealthy manner for some time, Melvil drew aside the tapestry which separated the gallery in which he stood from the royal chamber, and, perceiving that the queen's back was towards him, he stole gently in, and heard her play excellently well. In a few moments, her majesty, turning suddenly round, and discovering the intruder, ran forwards, threatening to strike him with her left hand. She was not used, she said, to play before men, and inquired how he came there? "I was walking," replied Melvil, at no loss for a plausible and flattering explanation, "in the gallery, with my Lord Hunsdon, when I heard such melody as ravished me, and drew me within the chamber, I wist not how." Elizabeth was greatly delighted. She invited him to remain; and, sitting down upon a cushion, she inquired whether she or Mary was the most skilful performer? "In that," says he, "I gave her the praise."* Not content with this exhibition, she detained him at court during two days, on purpose to allow him to witness her movements in the dance. Having enjoyed this edifying spectacle, he was again required to institute comparisons between her own style of dancing and that of his royal mistress. He admitted that "his queen danced not so high or disposedly as she did."

Previous to the return of Melvil to Scotland, the Dudley created proposed husband of Mary, Lord Earl of Leicester. Robert Dudley, was created Earl of Leicester, with great solemnity, at Westminster; "the queen herself," says the ambassador, "helping to put on his ceremonial, he sitting on his knees before her, keeping a great gravity and discreet behaviour; but she could not refrain from putting her hand on his neck, to kittle (tickle) him, smilingly—the French ambassador and I standing beside her. Then," continues Melvil, "she asked me how I liked him? I said, as he was a worthy subject, he was happy in having encountered a princess that could discern and reward good service. "Yet," she said, pointing to Lord Darnley, "ye like better yonder long lad." "My answer again was, that no woman of spirit would make shame of such a man, who was more like a woman than a man; for he was very lusty, beardless, and lady-faced." Melvil himself explains the object of this sarcastic remark. He was instructed by his sovereign to communicate with Lady Lennox, Darnley's mother, and procure her permission for the visit of her son to Scotland; and on this account, in order to conceal from Elizabeth his special mission, he was anxious to appear unprepossessed with the character and personal appearance of the youthful Darnley.

On the subject of her own marriage, Elizabeth on one occasion declared, "that it was her resolution at this moment to remain till her death a virgin queen; and that nothing would except her to change her mind but the undetected behaviour of the queen her sister." "Madam," replied Melvil, with a profound insight into her true character, "you need not tell me that: I know your steady stomach; you think that if you were married you would be but queen of England, and now, you are king and queen both; you may not really be a commander." She said, that she earnestly desired a meeting with Mary. Melvil proposed to her a romantic project, with which she appeared much pleased. He offered to convey her secretly into Scotland, disguised like a page, as King James the Fifth had visited France under like circumstances; and that, during his absence, it might be given out that she was laid up, and kept in her chamber. "Alas!" said the queen, "would that it might be done."*

Before his departure from England, Melvil had an interview with Leicester, who Melvil inquired how his proposed marriage was regarded by Mary herself. Melvil, according to his instructions, answered in a cold, unobtrusive manner. Leicester then began to praise as to himself "of so proud a profession as to marry so great a queen—esteeming himself not worthy to dight her echoons" (wipe her shoes), and adding that this proposition had originated with Cecil, his secret enemy; "for if," said he, "I should have seemed to desire that marriage, I should have had the favour of both queens." He then counselled Melvil to excuse him to the queen, that she might not impute that fault to him, but to the nature of his enemies.†

carrying with him many valuable presents to his royal mistress. After delivering to her the friendly messages with which he had been charged from the English queen, he dwelt upon the kindness, and even cordiality of his reception, and repeated the expressions of esteem and attachment which had fallen from the lips of Elizabeth. With this general account, however, Mary was by no means satisfied. In order to be guided in her subsequent conduct in the important negotiations which were still pending between the two courts, she insisted upon Melvil's giving his own opinion as to the sincerity of the strong protestations of Elizabeth. She inquired whether he conceived the queen of England meant truly towards her, as well inwardly in her heart, as she appeared to do outwardly by her speech? To this he replied in words that must have filled Mary with distrust and alarm: "In my judgment," said he, "there was neither plain dealing nor upright meaning, but great dissimulation, emulation, and fear that your princely qualities should overshine, chase her out, and displace her from her kingdom, as having already hindered the marriage with the Archduke Charles of Austria, and now offering my Lord of Leicester, whom she herself would be loth to want." On this, adds Melvil, the queen gave him her hand that she would never marry the new-made earl.*

Melvil, as we have seen, had succeeded in re-establishing a good understanding between the two queens; but this was in constant danger of being again interrupted through the suspicious temper of Elizabeth. A rumour about this time reached her from France, that the proposed marriage with Leicester had, since the return of her envoy, been lightly and contemptuously spoken of by Mary. This was a new ground of offence, and she did not fail to manifest her displeasure. This circumstance is alluded to in a letter from Queen Mary to Beaton, Archbishop of Glasgow, and then her minister at the court of France. In this epistle she says:—"I sent to the queen, my good sister, with an apology for some letters of mine, which she thought somewhat rude, but has taken the interpretation he put upon them in good part. She has since sent to me by Randolph, who is now here, some very polite letters, written with her own hand, containing fair words, and some complaints that the queen (regent of France) and her ambassador had assured her that I had published in mockery the overtures she had made for my marriage with the Lord Robert. I cannot imagine that any one there would wish to embroil me so much with her, since I have neither spoken of it to any one, nor written of it even to the queen (of France), who, I am sure, would not have borne such testimony against me." †

In the meantime, the long-appointed meeting between the commissioners who were to arrange the conditions of a union between Mary and Leicester took place at Berwick, on the 19th of November. Moray and Lethington were sent on the part of Mary; Bedford and Randolph on the part of Elizabeth. The meeting ended in nothing; indeed, it was a solemn farce. This result was nothing more than what might have been expected in the circumstances of the case. It is certain that Elizabeth, not knowing her own mind, still hesitated between the prospective advantages of an alliance between Leicester and Mary, and the pain which the giving up of this favourite involved; or, being secretly resolved upon retaining him near her person, she was playing on the credulity of Mary, and following out a line of policy the most crooked and dishonest. In either case, from the want of definite instructions, which wholly precluded them from concluding negotiations, which indeed they were hardly warranted to commence; without having powers to determine either way to complete or break off the arrangements, the commissioners were reduced to the necessity of doing nothing, and thus confirming in the mind of Mary the suspicions of Elizabeth's sincerity, which had been awakened by the report of Melvil. Other circumstances, however, appear at this time to have favoured the views of Leicester, if that nobleman had ever seriously aspired to the hand of Mary. Melvil says, that he had endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the Scottish queen, and, as it seems, with partial success:—"He had written such wise and discreet letters unto my Lord Moray for his excuses, that the queen appeared to have such good liking of him as that the Queen of England began to fear and suspect that the said marriage might perchance take effect; and, therefore, my Lord Darnley obtained the rather license to come to Scotland, who was a lusty youth, in hopes that he should prevail, being present, before Leicester, being absent; which license was obtained by means of Secretary Cecil, not that he was minded that either of the marriages should take effect, but with such shifts and practices to keep the queen as long unmarried as he could. For he persuaded himself that my Lord Darnley durst not pass forward without the consent of the Queen of England to the said marriage, his land lying in England, and his mother remaining there. Therefore he thought it lay in the queen his own mistress's hand to let the marriage go forward, or stay the same at her pleasure; and in case my Lord Darnley should disobey the queen of England's charge to come back at her call, intended to forfeit him, whereby he should lose all his lands, rights, and titles that he had in England." *

Whatever might have been Mary's opinion of the temporising and ungenerous Willingness of conduct of Elizabeth, it appears Mary to conclude by no means doubtful that, having a marriage with Leicester. so long contemplated the marriage with Leicester—desirous of perpetuating, if possible, the friendly intercourse which then subsisted between the two countries, and steadily refusing her sanction to the foreign alliances which continued to be pressed upon her, through the assiduity of her uncle, the Cardinal de Lorraine—she was not indisposed to conclude the union with the favourite of Elizabeth, provided the conditions were complied with, which had all along been regarded by her as the basis of the proposed contract. Such was the opinion at least of her ministers and most confidential advisers; for we find them in the month of December assuring Cecil, that there were no serious obstacles in the way of her marriage with Leicester; and that if he procured, by an act of the legislature, the recognition of Mary's claims to the succession, they would undertake for its speedy consummation. The same conviction is expressed by Randolph in a letter to the English Secretary of State, of date 14th December, 1564. These, and other documents, extracts from which we shall now present to the reader, are important, in order to the justification of Mary's conduct throughout the whole of these tedious and protracted negotiations, and to show that she had always been sincere in her sentiments, honest and straightforward in her purpose. In the letter to Cecil, alluded to above, Randolph observes:—"The stay now standeth either in the queen's majesty (Elizabeth) to have all this performed, or in his lordship's self (Leicester), that hath the matter so well framed to his hand that much more, I believe, there need not be than his own consent with that which may be for the queen's majesty's honour to do for him. It abideth now no longer deliberation; you have the offer—you have the choice." In these words it is certainly intimated, with sufficient explicitness, that the whole responsibility of concluding or of not concluding the proposed marriage rested not with Mary, but on the one hand with Leicester, and on the other with Elizabeth and her ministers. Nothing can be more clear and satisfactory than Randolph's avowal, that, so far as Mary was concerned, she was willing to carry out the arrangement; and that the matter was, so to speak, out of her hands, and committed to the charge of the other parties included in the negotiation.

Randolph next proceeds to justify his statement, that 'it abideth now no longer deliberation,' by enumerating the causes which necessitated the arriving at a speedy decision either for or against the union. "Age," says he, "time, necessity of her state, compel her to marry: her people, her friends, press her thereunto. The offers made are such as not without good cause they can be refused, though some inconveniences may arise sooner in matching with one than with another; practices there are divers in hand. That which in this case is not a little to be considered is, that I have inquired of themselves, and find it true by others, that there is no man for whom, hitherto, any suit hath been made to match with this queen, that shall be more grateful or more acceptable to the people, than shall be my Lord Robert. There hath been more thought of my Lord Darnley before his father's coming than at this present. The father is now here well known; the mother more feared, a good deal than beloved of any that knoweth her."

Strong as were these representations, and urgent the reasons why the policy of the English queen should assume a determined form, they were unproductive of any good effect. Cecil, indeed, must have been strangely perplexed in what way to account to his correspondents for the surprise and irresolution of his royal mistress; and, that he was so, appears from the extraordinary character of his despatches, which Randolph describes as consisting of passages of such interminable length and obscure meaning, that "Lethington and Moray were worked up to great agonies and passions."

We have seen the sentiments of Elizabeth's envoy as to the delay which occurred in the settlement of this question. To complete the story, we must look at the opinions of Mary's confidential ministers. Moray and Lethington had to a considerable extent compromised themselves in the conduct of these negotiations. Entrusted by their sovereign with a general commission in this matter, they had gone beyond their instructions, and, in their anxiety to meet the wishes of the English queen, had acted in a manner which, had it become known to their sovereign or their countrymen, would have rendered them the objects of a not unnatural suspicion. In the following letter to Cecil, they complain of the unwholesome state in which matters were now placed, and exhibit in a very forcible manner the questionable position which they occupied, without having the power of extricating themselves from it, or of avoiding against the consequences of their own rashness. It was one thing, they remarked, for the Secretary of State in England to issue despatches, the contents of which he was not responsible as they were known to, and in fact dictated by, his own sovereign; it was a different thing for them to write such papers as they sent to the English court, having for their subject matters of the highest import, and the treatment of which they had used in their own discretion, and with all communication with their queen. In such circumstances, they contended they had a right to require that the negotiations should either be brought to a satisfactory conclusion, or altogether broken off. "We humbly," they said, "resolved to answer you without any delay of time, being more easy for us, for our respect, so to do, than it was for you to answer our former letter; forasmuch as we have some with whom we would dare or will communicate anything passed between us, and you were compelled to make your answers privy to our letter before you could answer it. Truth it is, that in another point you have some advantage, in that you have a sufficient warrant for what you write, and so work surely, writing nothing but that your mistress both knoweth and doth allow; and we, without any commandment or warrant, write such things as, being brought to light, were sufficient matters to overthrow our credit at our sovereign's hand, and put all we have in danger. Although our conscience doth not accuse us that we intend any prejudice to her majesty, yet, in princes' affairs, matters be as they list to take them; and it will not be allowed for a good reason, when they call their ministers to account, to say that we meant well."

In another paragraph, they allude to those long and obscure despatches which Cecil had transmitted to Randolph, and out of whose interminable complications they had been unable to extract a meaning. "In your letter," they observe, "you have well provided that we shall find no lack for shortness thereof; yet, to speak squarely our opinion, we think you could in fewer lines have comprehended matter more to our contentation, and better for furtherance of the purpose intended, if you had a sufficient warrant, and therewithal a mind to fall roundly to work with us. * * * When we came to those words—that seeing us mean to fall roundly to work, you will also go roundly to work with us, and proceed plainly—we looked for a plain resolution; but having read over that which followed, you must bear with us if we find ourselves nothing satisfied; for in that same plain speech there be many obscure words and dark sentences, and (pardon us that we say so), in a manner, as many words as there be, as many ambiguities do result thereof." How must this old and wily diplomatist, who had no other end in view than the mystification of the Scottish ministers, have rejoiced over this doleful complaint of his puzzled correspondents, which proved how completely he had succeeded in "darkening counsel by words without knowledge."

About this time—viz. the commencement of the year 1565—Mary retired from the metropolis to the city of St. Andrew's, which was with her a favourite retreat, where she exchanged for a few days the cares of office, for the enjoyments and repose of domestic life. Here she resided, without any ostentation, and with only a small retinue of attendants, in the house of a merchant burgh. Thither, however, she was followed by Randolph, who carried with him a special message from his queen. Mary was at first extremely unwilling to be intruded upon in her delightful privacy. "It was," she said, "her holiday time; she had come to St. Andrew's to be relieved from the pressure of state affairs, and she objected to have grave and weighty matters submitted to her consideration." Randolph was therefore obliged to wait for a more favourable opportunity for bringing before her the business which he was anxious to discuss. In the meantime he continued in the city, according to his usual account, dining and supping with her every day. "Your majesty," says he, writing to Elizabeth, "was often drunken unto by her at dinners and suppers. Having in this sort continued with her Grace, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, I thought it time to take occasion to utter to her that which last I received in command from your majesty by Mr. Secretary's letter, which was to know her resolution touching those matters propounded at Berwick by my Lord of Bedford and me to my Lords Moray and Lethington. I had no sooner spoken these words," continues he, "than she saith—'I see now well that you are weary of this company and treatment. I sent for you to be merry, and to see how like a bourgeois wife I live with my little troop, and you will interrupt our pastimes with your great and grave matters. I pray you, sir, if you be weary here, return home to Edinburgh, and keep your gravity and great embassy until the queen cometh thither; for, I assure you, you shall not get her here, nor I know not myself where she is become. You see neither cloth of estate, nor such appearance, that you should think I am she at St. Andrew's that I was at Edinburgh.' I said," continues Randolph, "that I was very sorry for that, for that at Edinburgh she said that she did love the queen, my mistress, better than any other, and now I marvelled how her mind was changed. It pleased her at this to be very merry, and called me by more names than were given me at my christendom. At these merry conceits much good sport was made. 'Well, sir,' said she, at length, 'that which then I spoke in words shall be confirmed to my good sister, your mistress, in writing. Before you go out of this town, you shall have a letter unto her; and for yourself, go where you will, I care no more for you.' The next day, however, I was willed to be at my ordinary table, and placed the next person (saving worthy Beaton) to the queen's self." In many respects, the interviews of Randolph with the queen in this old city of St. Andrew's are important, as, from the open manner in which she delivered her sentiments, we have reason to believe that she expressed frankly and unreservedly her real feelings. We shall therefore record at some length her conversations with Randolph, as reported by himself in her conversations his correspondence with Elizabeth. with Randolph. "She had occasion," says he, "to speak much of France, for the honour she received there to be the wife of a great king, and for the friendship showed unto her by many in particular, for which occasions she was bound to love the nation, to show them pleasure, and do them good. Her acquaintance, indeed, was not so forgotten there, nor her friendship so little esteemed, but yet it was divers ways sought to be continued. There were those among her subjects, too, who had had their nurture in France, who were also well affected that way for the commodity of the service, as those of the men-at-arms and the archer-guard; besides her merchants, for the privileges they had enjoyed, greater than had been granted to any other nation."

From these remarks we learn the great attach-women as by our predecessors have been before. Let us seek this honour against some other, rather than fall at debate among ourselves." "I asked her grace," says Randolph, "whether she would be content one day, whenever it were, to give her assistance for the recovery of Calais?" At this question Mary laughed, and said, "Many things must pass between my good sister and me before I can give you answer; but I believe to see the day that all our quarrels shall be one, and assure you, if we be not, the fault shall not be in me." Randolph then inquired "how she liked the suit of my Lord Robert, Earl of Leicester, that he might write her opinion of him to Elizabeth." "My mind towards him," replied Mary, "is such as it ought to be of a very noble gentleman, as I hear say by many; and such a one as the queen, your mistress, my good sister, does so well like to be her husband, if he were not her subject, ought not to dislike me to be mine. Marry! what I shall do, lieth in your mistress's will, who shall wholly guide me and rule me."*

Thus ended this important conference with Randolph; interesting not only for the revelation of her feelings towards Elizabeth, but also as affording us many and pleasing glimpses of Mary's real character, as they shone out unobscured by the frigid formalities of her ordinary courtly life. Mary's residence at St. Andrew's was limited to ten days; and the same day witnessed her departure from that city, and the arrival at Berwick of Henry, Lord Darnley. The alleged object of his journey to Scotland was to pay a visit to his father, the Earl of Lennox. There is little doubt, however, that his real views involved projects of deeper significance. Whatever may have been his plans, whether original to himself or suggested by others, the ambitious character of the house of Lennox was well known, and his mother was regarded as peculiarly skilful in craft and intrigue. We have seen that Melvil was commissioned by Mary to request the Countess of Lennox to procure permission for Darnley to visit Scotland. Elizabeth was not indisposed to grant her this favour, as she thereby afforded herself a chance of escaping from the difficulties in which she was involved, through her disingenuous conduct with regard to Leicester. He was, therefore, furnished by her commands, not only with a license to visit the neighbouring kingdom, but also with credentials to the Scottish court, and a flattering letter of recommendation to Randolph from the Earl of Leicester. He arrived at Edinburgh on the 12th of February, 1565, and was received with that distinction to which he was entitled as a prince of the blood-royal. "There came unto him," says Randolph, "my Lord of Morton, the Earl of Glencairn, and divers other gentlemen that were then in town. He dined one day with my Lord Robert, the queen's brother, at Holyrood-house. His courteous bearing and dealing with all men deserveth great praise, and is well spoken of."

* Randolph to Elizabeth, 6th Feb., 1564-5.

Many surmises were made to account for the presence in Scotland of this young nobleman. Conscious of this, and feeling that his position demanded the greatest circumspection, Darnley acted in such a way as to conciliate all parties. Speaking of the numerous conjectures which were formed concerning him, Randolph writes—"They like well of his personage; what to judge of his other qualities, the time hath not yet served to have any great trial. There are here a great number that do wish him well. Others doubt what he will prove, and deeplier consider what is fit for the state of the country than us: they call him a fair young man. Some suspect more than I do myself that his presence may hinder other purposes intended, as that in special whereabout I go. Others, suspecting his religion, can allow of nothing that they can see in him. With all these diversities, I have had some discourses."*

Darnley's first interview with Mary was at the castle of Wemyss, in Fifeshire. His first interview with Mary. This, however, was not the first view with Mary. introduction of the royal relatives to each other. Four years previously, in the early days of the queen's widowhood, she had been visited by her cousin, then a youth of fifteen, who delivered from his mother, the Countess of Lennox, a letter of condolence on the death of her consort, Francis. Her reception of him on the present occasion was frank and cordial. If we may believe the account of Sir James Melvil, she was favourably impressed by his personal appearance. "Her majesty," says he, "took well with him; she remarked, 'he was the handsomest and best proportioned lang man she had seen;' for he was of a tall stature, lang and small, even and brent up (straight), and well instructed from his youth in all honest and comely exercises."†

The long series of tedious and unmeaning negotiations, which, originating in the proposed marriage of Mary with the Earl of Leicester, had been protracted to no purpose, were now about to be concluded, and that in an unexpected and summary manner. What object Elizabeth had proposed to herself to gain by the adoption of the policy which she had now perseveringly pursued for upwards of two years, it is utterly impossible to conjecture. Certainly it does appear as if that policy was intended to retard, rather than to hasten—to prevent altogether, rather than provide for—the marriage of the Scottish queen; and had for its origin the capriciousness of a jealous woman, rather than the wisdom of a sovereign and the generosity of a sister. To the last Mary was willing to oblige Elizabeth. In an interview with Randolph, shortly before the announcement of the Queen of England's final decision, an allusion having been made to Leicester, she observed—"Of that matter I will say no more, till I see the greater likelihood; but no creature living shall make me break more of my will than my good sister, if she will use me as a sister; if not, I must do as I may."*

Every effort was at the same time made by her ministers to bring the matter to a conclusion, and persuade Elizabeth to comply with the conditions on which the marriage with Leicester depended for its consummation. Moray, in particular, who, as already mentioned, had compromised himself in the affair, urgently represented to Randolph the necessity imposed upon him of adopting such measures as would, in the eyes of the queen, justify him in the conduct he had so long pursued. He was responsible, he said, for the policy which Mary had followed in consonance with his advice. He had held out to her hopes, that, if she deferred to the wishes of Elizabeth, her rights in the matter of the succession would be acknowledged; and it would prove his ruin if these hopes should, after all, be found to be fallacious. If he had the satisfaction of feeling that he had been true to his sovereign, and had performed his duty, he could submit to lose much of his authority and power. He expressed himself as much alarmed at the prospect of a foreign alliance. "If," said he, "she marry any other than Leicester, what mind will the new king bear me, that knoweth I have so strongly opposed his advancement? If he be a Papist, either we must obey, or fall into new misery and difficulty, whilst I shall be regarded as the ringleader of the discontented. But what need to say more of this, you have often heard me say as much before; and yet we see nothing but drift of time, delays from day to day: to do all for nothing, and to get nothing for all!"†

The final resolution of Elizabeth with regard to the proposition of the Scottish ministers was now declared. It amounted to this—that she could not bind herself to recognise Mary's title, till she had made up her own mind whether she would marry or not; that if the queen would accept Leicester as a simple earl, she would be well pleased; and in that case she intended that this nobleman should be advanced to still higher honours. This declaration at once put an end to all further negotiations, and annihilated the hopes of Mary. It was a cruel disappointment. The fair representations of the English ambassador, the repeated and solemn protestations of friendship on the part of Elizabeth, and the assurances of her own ministers, Moray and Lethington, had all flattered her into the belief that her claims had been favourably regarded, and after some delay would be formally acknowledged. For years the recognition of her right of succession had been the grand object of her ambition—the moving principle of her policy. In conjunction with her husband, Francis, she had assumed the arms of England, and quartered them with her own. And when, conformable to a treaty with England, she had abandoned the use of these arms, it was only that her claims might be brought before the legislature, divested of any appearance of arrogant assumption, and represented as put forward on the sole ground of equity and justice. On assuming the reins of government, she had cultivated the most intimate relations with the English court, expressed in warm terms, her desire that a lasting friendship might be established between herself and Elizabeth; anxiously endeavoured to make arrangements for an interview with that sovereign; and in spite of the coldness with which her proposals were received, continued to exert herself for the continuance of the amicable understanding that then subsisted between the two monarchs. Her own inclination, the desire of her people, the exigencies of her position, imposing on her the necessity of marriage, she consulted Elizabeth on the choice of a consort, and expressed her willingness to be guided by her wishes, or, rather, to be satisfied with her decision. Several brilliant offers for her hand were made and rejected by foreign princes, some of which would have formed an unsuitable alliance even for the Queen of Scotland. These she rejected—some of them, perhaps, with hesitation—and thereby excited the displeasure of influential relatives in France. In all this she had, no doubt, an object in view—the recognition of her claims as heiress-apparent to the English throne. The professions of Elizabeth afforded her good grounds for anticipating a favourable issue to the policy she had thus perseveringly pursued. Leicester was proposed as her consort, and that nobleman she professed herself willing to accept, on the conditions already specified. Her wishes must be sacrificed at the shrine of her ambition, but that sacrifice she was ready to make. We may condemn her resolution—we cannot but admit her consistency. The ministers of both countries entered on a series of negotiations which ended at a brief and satisfactory settlement of this question. Commissioners met at Berwick, but ^{nothing} was adjusted. The court of England was visited by Sir James Melvil, who, tired, persuaded of the dissimulation of the English queen, and disgusted with her infidelity. Gradually, Elizabeth retreated from her engagements, and retracted her promises. To the last Mary was sincere in her professions of attachment; and even by the prejudiced Randolph, her affection was pronounced genuine and unfeigned. How true unshaken confidence in the honesty of the Queen of England's intentions—maintained, even in the face of numerous delays and disappointments—was proved by the final resolution of Elizabeth, we have already seen. It was not surprising, then, that, on the intelligence being communicated to her, which we have just recorded, Mary was strongly agitated, and, after her interview with Randolph, indulged in a passionate fit of weeping. Not that we would say that, under the first impulse of indignation, she addressed a bitter letter of remonstrance to her so-called good sister, using, as Cecil observes, "evil speech of her Majesty, and alleging that she had abused her, and made her waste her time."

Much of the subsequent conduct of Mary may be traced to the revolution occasioned in her mind by this discovery of the falsehood and treachery of Elizabeth. If, for example, she had exercised great toleration towards her Protestant subjects, contrary, perhaps, to her own inclinations, certainly in the face of repeated and urgent remonstrances from the nobility and clergy of the Catholic persuasion. she had only, in so doing, acted a part in consistency with her general policy. To exhibit hostility towards the religion established in the country, to promulgate oppressive measures for the persecution of its adherents—if it did not endanger her own security, would certainly have roused in England a storm of indignation which would effectually have terminated for ever any hopes she entertained of having her rights acknowledged. But now that this motive for the forbearance she had displayed in dealing with the Reformers was removed, we have no reason to be surprised if we find her resolutely opposing the religion she had fostered, and regarding with coldness and distrust the very men to whom she had formerly extended her greatest confidence. Another unfortunate result of the treachery of Elizabeth was the alienation of the Scottish queen from her confidential advisers, Moray and Lethington. In them, too, she found herself deceived; not one of their fair promises had been realised; and it was not unnatural she should identify them with the duplicity and falsehood so shamefully discovered in the conduct of the English queen. This was a consequence which, as already noticed, was anticipated by the sagacious Moray. "The queen," he observed to Randolph, "would dislike and suspect him, because he had deceived her with promises he could not realise." From these circumstances it will readily be perceived that the position of the queen was one of extreme difficulty and great peril. She was still young and inexperienced; she was hasty in her confidences, and given to rashness in her measures. She was no match for the sovereign of England, backed by the intriguing Randolph and the wily Cecil. She was not initiated into the mysteries of state-craft; and her experiences, so far as they went, were unfortunate and discouraging. Elizabeth had deceived and injured her; she was the victim "of fraud, selfishness, and falsehood." Randolph was a mere spy upon her actions; Moray and her trusted Lethington had aided in her defeat, and ministered to her mortification. She had no security that, having had her confidence once abused, she would not be again betrayed. From the Protestants she could look for no assistance, and little sympathy. The Catholics she had treated with coldness, almost with contempt, and now, in her hour of need, she might find their loyalty questionable and their attachment lukewarm. If she turned from Scotland to France, desirous of renewing the ancient understanding between the two countries, she found her relatives alienated, and her uncles disgusted with her repeated refusals to contract an alliance with some of the illustrious branches of the royal family. Her position, therefore, was one of extreme difficulty; she had been taught to mistrust every one about her—the lesson, unhappily, was not thrown away; and if we subsequently find her betrayed into imprudences which she had afterwards reason to deplore, we are bound to make allowances for her natural weakness of character, and remember the combination of circumstances against which, isolated and unbefriended, she had to contend.

Her first thoughts were naturally given to the subject of her marriage. This was a necessary step, both on account of her present situation, and the well-known wishes of her subjects. It is not wonderful that, everything considered, she looked towards Darnley; an alliance with Mary proposes to whom, she conceived, would be marry Darnley. beneficial to her own interests, and tend to conciliate a large body of her people. As a prince of the blood-royal, he was her equal in birth—his grandmother being the sister of Henry the Eighth, and his mother cousin-german to Queen Elizabeth. The mother of Darnley, the Countess of Lennox, was Mary's most dangerous rival in her claim upon the English succession. Though born of a second marriage, she was one degree nearer the blood-royal of England than Mary, having been the daughter of Margaret, the eldest sister of Henry, while Mary, Queen of Scotland, was only her granddaughter. But this was not the only advantage over Mary which was possessed by the Countess of Lennox. The latter was born in England, and by a maxim of law in that country with regard to private inheritances, "whoever is not born in England, or at least of parents who, at the time of his birth, were in the obedience of the King of England, cannot enjoy any inheritance in this kingdom." This maxim, an English lawyer of the name of Hales produced in a treatise which he published at this time, with the intention of applying it to the regulation of the right of succession to the crown.*

The claims of the house of Lennox had long been regarded by Mary with uneasiness and alarm, and laid the foundation of that friendly intercourse which she had formerly established with them, and now laboured to perpetuate. To unite herself with this house, through her union with Her motives. Darnley, appeared to offer an easy and legitimate solution of the difficulties which might arise out of their rival claims upon the same prize; and by the marriage of the parties principally concerned, their interests would become identified. It was probably the idea of some not very well-defined compromise, suggesting itself to the mind of Mary, which induced her with such earnestness to solicit the return to Scotland of the Earl of Lennox; and now that the marriage with Leicester was broken off, and Elizabeth had voluntarily freed her from the obligations under which she had come, she resolved to act without reference to this capricious sovereign, and to contract an alliance agreeable to her own wishes, whether those wishes were regarded with approbation or resentment by the English court. She had, however, just grounds for anticipating that her projected union with Darnley would not be displeasing to Elizabeth. That princess, while repeatedly avowing her determination to oppose with all her influence any alliance with a foreign prince, had expressly affirmed that a marriage with any of the nobility of England would meet with her sanction and approval. In her choice of Darnley, the conditions specified were adhered to. He was a subject of England; he had extensive estates in that country; he was not only a member of the nobility, but a near relative of the sovereign. And when, therefore, as we shall afterwards see, this marriage was opposed by the queen, and that, too, upon the most frivolous pretexes, we can only conclude that this refusal to grant the concurrence which was asked, proceeded from the same jealous disposition, and the same ungenerous spirit, as that which had given birth to her former dark and unprincipled policy.

The conduct of Darnley, on his arrival in Scotland, was prudent and wary. He appears to have made an agreeable impression equally on the mind of Mary and of her subjects. Suspected of being a Papist, he ingratiated himself with the Reformers, and attended on the preaching of Knox. "Yesterday," writes Randolph to Cecil, "both his lordship (Darnley) and I dined with my lord of Moray. His lordship's behaviour is very well liked, and hitherto he so governeth himself that there is great praise of him. Yesterday he heard Mr. Knox preach, and came in the company of my lord of Moray. After supper, after that he had seen the queen and divers other ladies dance, he, being required by my lord of Moray, danced a galliard with the queen, who, after this travel of her's, is come home stronger than she went forth."

But this moderation of conduct did not long continue. Intoxicated with the extraordinary favour shown to him by the queen, his treatment of the nobles became imperious and intolerable. Aspiring to the hand of his sovereign, and finding his pretensions allowed, and his advances permitted, he imagined his ambitious projects already realised, and acted with all the haughtiness of a king-consort. Young, ardent, and impetuous, of weak understanding and passionate temper, elated with his present position, and dazzled with the magnificent prospects dawning on his imagination, he soon ceased to impose any restraints on his conduct, and discovered an overbearing insolence of deportment and extravagance of behaviour, which mortally offended the nobility, and alienated the respect of those who had formerly regarded him with some degree of favour, and even of adulation. Randolph declares that he indulged in insupportable boastings as to the strong party he had formed in England; inveighed in bitter terms against the Earl of Moray as possessed of power exorbitant and dangerous, and contrived in a short time to make himself so many enemies, that it was whispered he must soon either change his conduct or lose his life.*

One feature in the conduct of Darnley was extremely offensive to the nobility, and weakened at once their contempt and disgust. This was his who, having been at first introduced to the notice of Mary through his accomplishments as a musician, gradually advanced himself to her favour, till, in consequence of the disgrace of Rastell, her former secretary, he was promoted to this post,

* MS. State Paper Office. Randolph to Cecil, 29th March, 1564-5.

† The following is Sir James Melvil's account of this personage:—"Now there came here in company with the ambassador of Savoy, one David Riccio, of the country of Piedmont, that was a merry fellow, and a good musician, and her majesty had three variants of his playing and sang three parts, and wanted a boon to sing the fourth part. Therefore they told her majesty of the time to be the fourth morning—in short, that he was drawn into the king sometimes with the rest, and afterwards, when the ambassador, his master, returned, he moved to this country, and was received into her majesty's service as a valet de chambre. And afterwards, when the French secretary retired himself to France, this David obtained the said office, and thereby entered into greater favour, and obtained her majesty's ear at times in presence of the nobles, and when there was greatest conversation of the court, which made him be so envied and hated, that he presented all occasions to be advanced to her majesty, that some of the nobles would give up their place, and some of them would quarrel with and threaten him, when they entered into the chamber, and found him always speaking with her majesty, and that some of them had hard terms to be spoken to him, whereby in a short time he became very rich. He without more said, therefore," Melvil continues, "he happened to come with her, and asked my counsel how to behave himself. I told him that strangers were commonly hated, when they were so overmuch in the affairs of her majesty, and that he should be being secretary to her majesty in the year 1564, and on that occasion thereby to occupy her majesty's ear, and that the secretary used to do. I said also that the nobles would be through his hands; and advised him to be very careful, when he were present, to give them some play, or some other recreation, to be content therewith; and showed him, for example how I had been in so great favour with her, and how I had board being drawn, and that he should be in the whole court: what sort of recreation he should give them against me, which seem as I had said, that he should let me sit from his own table, and that he should let gentlemen, and come to make with me, and that he should be hated, nor myself to be envied. This is what he professed, was sound policy; and Melvil, who had the part of a friend in giving such advice to the king, was not to be blamed. According to Riccio's own account, he would not follow the counsel, but the queen, as he alleged, would not let him do to act upon it. This is probably the reason why she was so unhappy fortune of Mary to be so much in the favour of a man who she was justly justified to have in the great of intention, but which, nevertheless, gave occasion to many injurious constructions and evil sayings."

and employed in conducting her French correspondence.

"The sudden promotion of this man," says Buchanan, "from a state of beggary to wealth, without any intermediate gradation—his fortune so far above his merit, his arrogance so far beyond his fortune, his contempt for his equals, and his rivalry with his superiors—already gave rise to many remarks." Riceio probably courted Darnley, whose fortunes he perceived were in the ascendant, with the view of securing his countenance and protection against the attacks of the nobility, whose attitude towards him was daily assuming a more threatening aspect. On the other hand, Darnley appears to have encouraged his advances, and to have lived on familiar terms with the fortunate secretary, whose influence with the queen he doubtless expected would be used for the furtherance of his ambitious projects. As it was, this intimacy occasioned the alienation of many noblemen, the loss of whose friendship he had afterwards good reason to lament.

The extraordinary favour which had been shown by Mary towards the house of Lennox, was viewed with suspicion and alarm by various parties in the state. Most of the nobility were of opinion that to Lennox and his son would be entrusted the whole authority of the government, and that their influence at court would shortly become paramount. The Duke of Chatelherault in particular, under whose regency the Earl of Lennox had been banished, anticipated nothing less than the entire ruin of his fortunes and the destruction of his house. Moray, also, could not fail to perceive that his power was on the wane, and his influence supplanted by the rising favourite. So great was his dissatisfaction that, pretending to be Moray withdrawn offended with the popish ceremony practised at the abbey, he withdrew from court, for the purpose of mustering his party and collecting his resources. According to the statements of Randolph—to which, however, implicit evidence must not at all times be given—the people were universally discontented; threatening murmurs were heard among all classes; and if Elizabeth, he remarked, felt disposed to raise factions in Scotland, and embroil the country, there never was a time in which she could do so with greater probabilities of success.*

But that princess was herself the object of grave suspicions on the part of the Scottish people. It was openly affirmed by many, that the events which had given rise to such deep dissatisfaction had been brought about by her own connivance and the intrigues of her ministers. It was affirmed that Darnley had been sent into Scotland for the very purpose of creating internal disturbances; that the policy of the Queen of England aimed at interposing obstacles in the way of an alliance being contracted between Mary and any powerful foreign potentate; that the object of Elizabeth was to force upon the Scottish queen some contemptible marriage, which would humble her in the eyes of her own subjects and in those of Europe; and that, finally, she was anxious to bring about a rupture in the friendly intercourse of the two kingdoms.* These were accusations which her ministers could not well meet with a satisfactory answer. Her conduct during the late negotiations, even so much of it as was generally known, had given rise to the most injurious reflections on her character and intentions. It was notorious that the queen had been injured by Elizabeth; that she had failed to carry out her engagements; and every subsequent step taken by that princess would be watched with anxious and jealous scrutiny.

Whatever opinions may have been formed by others as to the growing intimacy of the queen with Darnley, Randolph seems to have been blind to its probable results. In a letter to Cecil, he observes, speaking of the measure which had been taken of his character and abilities:—"Of my Lord Darnley they have this opinion, that in wisdom he doth not much differ from his father. The honour, countenance, and entertainment that he hath had here, maketh him think no little of himself. Some persuade him that there is no less good-will born unto him by many of his nation, than that they think him a fit party for such a queen. How easily a young man so born in hand, daily in presence, well used, continually in company either of the best or next about her, may be induced, either by himself to attempt, or by persuasions of others to imagine, I leave it to the judgment of others. Of this queen's mind hitherto towards him, I am void of suspicion; but what affection may be stirred up in her, or whether she will be moved at any time that way, seeing she is a woman, and in all things desirous of having her will, I cannot say." †

We have spoken of the dissatisfaction which the countenance shown to the house of Lennox had given to many of the nobility, and especially to the Duke of Chatelherault. This is alluded to in strong terms in the letter from which we have just quoted. "I find him (the duke)," he says, "more pitied and better beloved than ever he was. He keepeth continually at home; few of his name repair to the court; they seek all quietly to live, and, through innocency, or not offence of late, to avoid all dangers that are intended, or what mischief shall be practised against them, whereof they do most assure themselves, if this queen do marry any other than Leicester, but especially if she should take my Lord Darnley. This putteth no small fear also among the Douglasses, for what cause your honour knoweth. ‡ With divers of them of late I have had some talk; I maintain them in good hope the best I can, that there is no danger that way. From the duke I received this message—that he cannot be without fear of the overthrow of his house, if the Lord Darnley marry the queen."

About this time, Bothwell, who it will be remembered had been obliged to quit the kingdom, on account of the part he had taken in the conspiracy of the Earl of Arran, returned suddenly, and without the queen's permission, to Scotland. This nobleman was known to be a person of profligate character, and he was in consequence treated by Mary with considerable severity. At the instigation of the Earl of Moray, whose life he had frequently threatened, it was resolved to bring him to a public trial. The charges made against him were of a serious description. He was arraigned for high-treason, in having conspired, three years previously, with the Earl of Arran, to seize the person of her majesty. The circumstances of this trial are alluded to by Randolph, in a despatch to the English secretary. "Upon Tuesday night," he says, "the 1st of May, there came up to this town my Lords of Moray and Argyle, to keep the day of law against the Earl of Bothwell, who appeared not, nor is it yet for certain known what is become of him, though the common report is, that he embarked at North Berwick. The company that came to this town in favour of my Lord high-treason. of Moray are esteemed five or six thousand; and, for my part, I assure your honour I never saw a greater assembly. More also had come, saving that they were stayed by the queen, who hath showed herself now of late to dislike that my Lord of Moray so earnestly persueth him, and will not give his advice to take the like advantage upon some others whom she beareth small affection unto. In this matter, thus far they have proceeded:—Upon the Wednesday he was called, and, for lack of appearance, was condemned in the same; farther the queen would not that the justice-clerk should proceed, which hath brought so much misliking, and given occasion of such kind of talk against her grace, for bearing with such men in her own cause, that that which is already spoken passeth all measure."

It is not easy to understand what Randolph means by these assertions. The very fact that Mary allowed Bothwell to be brought to trial contradicts the statement that he was treated with undue favour. Randolph himself reports that Bothwell had of late behaved towards the queen in such a scandalous and insulting manner, as to force her to declare that he had forfeited all claims to her respect and forbearance.*

Randolph then proceeds to describe to Cecil the state of parties, and adds some interesting details in connection with the Scottish court. "With my Lord of Argyle there came to this town the Lord David and the duke's son, with most part of the duke's friends. Assured bands and promises are made between the duke and the Lord of Moray, that nothing shall be attempted against each other; but it shall be defended to the uttermost of their powers. The Earl of Glencairn, having been required by the Earl of Lennox to enter into the like band, hath refused it, and joined with the Duke. My Lord of Morton this time was absent, but so confident that I have not heard any man worse spoken of. He is now in hopes that my lady's grace (the Countess of Lennox) will give over her rights of Angus, and so he will become friend to that side. In this Lethington laboureth not much to his own praise. The Lord Ruthven, Lethington's chief friend, is wholly theirs, and chief considerer amongst them. Suspicions do rise on every side, to which I have my part, as of late, because I was at the West Border, and am thought to practice with the Marquis of Maxwell—I know not what myself. My Lord of Moray was willed not to have to do with me; and when he said 'he could not choose but speak well of me.' 'Well,' said the queen, 'if you will, let not Argyle have to do with him.'"

Randolph then alludes to Mary's rumored marriage with Darnley, and the probable conduct of Elizabeth in this matter. "It is feared that her majesty [Elizabeth] will over soon allow herself, and over hastily accord unto this queen's desires; at least, it is wished that there may be some open show of her majesty's discontentment. Lethington is supposed to favour more that way (I mean to my Lord Darnley) than he would seem; and yet, I assure you, he is scarcely treated amongst them—viz. Lennox's party—and, of late, despiteful words have been spoken against him upon certain words which he wrote to my Lord Moray, that he should persuade the queen to make no haste in the matter, but keep it in the stay it was when he left it. Thus your honour seeth our present state, and how things do frame amongst us. So much pride, such excess in vanities, so proud looks and despiteful words, and so poor a purse, I never heard of. My Lord of Lennox is now quite without money; he borrowed five hundred crowns of my Lord of Lethington, and hath scarcely enough now to pay for his horse-meat. If he have no more from you, we shall see him presently put to his shifts. His men are bolder and sadder, both with the queen's self and many noblemen, than ever I thought could have been borne; divers of them now resort to the mass, and glory in their change. Such pride is noted in the father and the son, that there is almost no society or company amongst them. My young lord, lying sick in his bed, hath already boasted the duke to knock his pate when he is whole."

Mary was now resolved upon the same so much dreaded by many of her nobility. It was her chosen policy to secure, if possible, the approbation and consent of Elizabeth. From various circumstances before alluded to, she had good reasons for anticipating that these would not be refused. About this time, therefore, she dispatched Lethington to the English court, with orders to communicate her intentions with regard to Darnley. This story arrived at Westminster on the 18th of April. Elizabeth affected the greatest surprise at the tidings of which he was the bearer. She refused at once, and in a peremptory manner, to countenance this marriage; and at the same time indulged in many bitter expressions, reflecting on the conduct of the Scottish queen. We have here another example of the ungracious character of Elizabeth in her treatment of Mary. On no grounds, but those of the most frivolous nature, could she oppose the contemplated alliance. Mary's resolution to marry had been often declared—the wishes of her subjects were well known—Elizabeth herself had urged her to the adoption of this step. In many respects, the union with Darnley was unexceptionable. The danger of introducing a foreign interest into Scotland, so justly dreaded, was thereby avoided. There was nothing in the condition or position of Mary's intended consort which could render him formidable to the English sovereign. Allied to both crowns, and possessed of lands in both kingdoms, he could not be dangerous to either. The apprehensions, therefore, which Elizabeth pretended to entertain with regard to this marriage were, even if really felt, totally without foundation. Whatever were the motives which weighed with the queen, she affected the greatest displeasure, and, without delay, summoning together her Privy Council, she laid before them the propositions for this projected union. As might be anticipated, they, after long-protracted deliberations, declared themselves unanimously opposed to it. "After sundry conferences, and many arguments among themselves, they all with one judgment thought this marriage with my Lord Darnley, being attended with such circumstances as therein do appear to be unusual, unprofitable, and directly prejudicial to the sincere amity between both the queens, and consequently perilous to the continuance of the mutual good concord and tranquillity that at present is known to be, and is desired to be made perpetual, betwixt both the realms."* The ostensible ground of their opposition was, that the measure was "plainly prejudicial to them both, and consequently dangerous to the weal of both their countries." It is worthy of notice, however, that the council carefully avoided specifying any particular dangers or prejudices which might, through this marriage, be entailed upon the two queens and their respective realms. The whole policy of Elizabeth, in fact, resolved itself into this, that Mary should either refrain from marriage altogether, or accept the husband whom, in her wisdom, she desired to impose upon her. "The sharpest thorn," says a French historian, "that ever the Queen of England dreaded, was a potent alliance to be made by the Queen of Scots." †

* A determination of the Privy Council of England upon the marriage of the Queen of Scots, 1st May, 1565.

† Both Buchanan and Knox acknowledge that this marriage was very generally believed not to be contrary to the Queen of England's liking, whatever dissatisfaction she might affect. And I have thought fit here to set down the French agent's (Mons. Castelmann de Mauvessière) sentiments of this

Before consummating her marriage with Darnley, Mary anxiously endeavoured to obtain the consent of Moray to this union. Every effort was employed for this purpose, but without effect. That nobleman had for some time absented himself from court, matter. This gentleman, speaking of our queen's marriage with foreign princes, saith—"But all these great alliances were equally disagreeable to the Queen of England, who never dreaded a sharper thorn in her foot than some potent foreign alliance to be made by the Queen of Scotland, whose kingdom lies so close upon hers, that they are only separated by a fordable river; and so she might be easily annoyed by a bad neighbour. This the Queen of England foreseeing, cast her eyes on the young Lord Darnley, to make a present of him to the Scottish queen; and found means to persuade the queen, by several powerful considerations, that there was not a marriage in Christendom which could bring her more certain advantages, together with the eventual succession to the kingdom of England, which she (the Queen of Scots) pretended to be lodged in her person, than this with the Lord Darnley; because they two, being joined in matrimony, with the consent of the Queen of England, and the wisest in both the kingdoms, would fortify each other's title, and so take out of the way many scruples which, in the event of time, might come to disturb these two neighbouring states. Now, this purpose was the more speedily executed, that it was approved by those in whom the Queen of Scots reposed most confidence—namely, the Earl of Moray, bastard brother to that queen, who had the management of all her affairs; the Laird of Lethington, her Secretary of State; and their confederates, who were all gained over to persuade their mistress not only to receive the said Lord Darnley kindly, and to give him a new title to his father's estate, but likewise to yield a favourable ear to the marrying of him, as being more useful to her for obtaining the crown of England than any other; and, moreover, to represent to her, that, if she should think of marrying either in France or Spain, the expenses and difficulties of accomplishing the same would be greater than Scotland could well bear. Besides, that such a marriage would not fail to create a jealousy in the Queen of England, who could take none at all against the Lord Darnley, her own subject and her own blood, as the Queen of Scots herself was.' Then, after he has told how fond our queen became of this marriage, and that she sent him into France to obtain that king and the queen-mother's consent to the marriage, he adds—"On my road, I met the Queen of England, who had been travelling into some parts of her kingdom; but her majesty did not outwardly show the joy and pleasure which was in her heart, when I told her that this marriage was advancing apace; on the contrary, she affected not to approve it; which thing, however, did rather hasten than retard it.' After he had been in France, and obtained their majesties' consent to the marriage, he returns through England, and then says—"I found the Queen of England much colder towards the Queen of Scots than formerly, complaining that she had subtracted her relation and subject, and that she was intending to marry him against her consent and approbation. And I am assured that these words were very far from her heart, for she used all her efforts, and spared nothing to set this marriage a-going.' Now, if these observations be well-founded, what shall we say of some princes and princesses? It will manifestly appear, by subsequent and authentic papers, that the Lord Darnley had a license from Queen Elizabeth to come into Scotland, and here to remain a certain space; yet, in her instructions to Sir Henry Norris, her ambassador in France, she expresseth herself thus—"It chanced that a young nobleman, our near kinsman, brought up in our court, named the Lord Darnley, was secretly enticed to pass into Scotland, upon other pretences, for private suits for lands, and such like—(the Lord Darnley had not, nor could have any suit for land)—and there without our knowledge, according to the same former practices whereof we were not altogether ignorant, though we would not seem so jealous of that same, he was suddenly accepted by that queen to be allied in contract of marriage with her, as one thought to be a meet person to work troubles in our realm for her advantage; yea, contrary to the advice of the wiser part of her council—(this is said without sufficient foundation)—and, consequently, contrary to our will and liking, was married to her in all haste."—See Sir Dudley Digges's Ambassador.

having felt that his influence had been undermined, and rendered almost nominal, ever since the arrival of Darnley in the kingdom. This was a result which his proud spirit was unable to brook. It may readily be supposed that he regarded Darnley, and indeed the whole house of Lennox, with feelings of aversion and resentment.

Conscious, however, of the importance of conciliating the earl, and remembering the important services which he had formerly rendered her, and the good offices she might yet require at his hands, she invited him back to court, and received him with many demonstrations of respect and confidence.

Her interview with Moray. The object she had in view soon declared. When alone with him in the chamber of Lord Darnley, the queen put into his hands a paper containing an unqualified approval of her projected marriage, and requested him to attach to it his signature. Probably the earl was not surprised at the demand; but several and weighty reasons induced him to withhold his assent. Entertaining a strong aversion for Darnley, whom, not unnaturally, he regarded as his rival and enemy, it was unreasonable to expect that he would voluntarily bestow upon him such an accession of power and dignity as was implied in his elevation to the throne. Alive to the importance of maintaining on its present footing the good understanding between the two countries, which depended on the friendly dispositions of the English sovereign, he necessarily hesitated to afford his sanction to an arrangement which he was perfectly aware would be obnoxious to Elizabeth. He had always openly preferred a confederacy with England, rather than the ancient alliance with France. Through the policy which he had recommended and carried out, this principle had been adopted. By consenting to her marriage with Darnley it was virtually surrendered, or at least endangered. "A league with England had been established, and he could not think of sacrificing to a rash and youthful passion an alliance of so much advantage to the kingdom, and which he and the other nobles were bound by every obligation to maintain."* Further, Darnley was obnoxious to Moray on account of his religion. On their first arrival in Scotland, Lennox and his son had successfully concealed from the nation their real sentiments. They carried their dissimulation to such a height as to attend, apparently with satisfaction, the ministrations of Protestant divines. No sooner, however,

He refuses his consent. did they find themselves secure in their position at court—their influence extending—their power consolidating—than they threw off the mask, and without hesitation discovered opinions very different from their previous professions. Foremost in the ranks of the Reformers—having played a conspicuous part in the enterprise which ended in the triumph of his faith, and its establishment in the kingdom—regarded, therefore, with truth as the champion of Protestantism, he could never consent that a Prophet should be chosen as the summit of his sovereignty, whose first act might, in all probability, attempt the overthrow of that religion which he was pledged to support, and resolved to defend. These considerations were the motives which weighed with Moray in firmly refusing to comply with her demand. "Her resolution," he said, "was ever hasty, and her demand upon him too sudden and peremptory. What would foreign princes think of such precipitation? What must be the opinion of the Queen of England, with whom her ambassador was even then in treaty, and whom almost daily expected? But, most of all," he continued, "he would be loath to consent to the marriage of any one of whom there was so little hope that he would be a favourer of which was the thing most to be desired—of one who hitherto had shown himself rather an enemy than a preserver of the same."* This answer, and the refusal it conveyed, intensely mortified Mary, and excited her extreme displeasure. She remonstrated with him in harsh and severe terms, reminding him of his many obligations to her kindness, and upbraiding him with base ingratitude; and then, unable to shake his resolution, dismissing him from her presence with expressions of her high resentment.

Mary had now entered on a course from which it was impossible to withdraw with credit or with honour. Her intentions with regard to Darnley were matters of public notoriety—they were the topic of conversation at court, and formed the subject of the special communication with which Lethington was charged to the English sovereign. In these circumstances, and in spite of the opposition of Moray, she had no alternative but to proceed to carry out her engagements. Informed by several of her confidential advisers, she acted in accordance with her own judgment, and resolved on the adoption of vigorous and decided measures. With this view, a few days subsequent to her interview with Moray, she summoned a convention of the nobility to meet her at Stirling, on the 15th of May. In the meantime, intelligence having reached her of the nature of Elizabeth's reply—exasperated at this treatment, the last of a series of unexampled insults—she dispatched ambassadors with instructions to Lethington, Mary with orders to Lethington which contrasted very strikingly with those which had formerly been to England delivered to him. The ambassador was recommended to return instantly to England, and to inform the queen, that, since she had been so long treated with fair speeches, and beguiled of her just expectation, she had now resolved, with the advice of the Estates of her realm, to use her own choice in her marriage, and to select such a husband as in her opinion should be most worthy of the crown to which he would be raised. These instructions were penned with her own hand. "They wanted," says the English ambassador, Throckmorton, who had seen them, "neither eloquence, despite, anger, love, nor passion." They were written by a woman, and that woman smarting under the sense of a long series of premeditated injuries at the hands of one from whom she had a right to expect very different treatment.

Lethington was directed, after fulfilling his instructions in England, to proceed immediately to France, for the purpose of explaining her intentions to the king, and endeavouring to procure his approbation of her marriage. With the view of inducing the secretary to act in this delicate matter with the greater promptitude and zeal, she wrote him, with her own hand, "the most favourable and gentle letter that ever queen addressed to her servant." Besides entrusting him with full powers, she gave him the command of a considerable sum of money, which, at this time, was due as part of the dowry which she received from France. Finally, in the event of his mission being successful, she promised him the highest advancement in the state which it was in her power to confer.* Beaton, who was the bearer of these instructions, encountered Lethington near Newark, as he was returning from his unfortunate embassy. Instead, however, of acting according to their direction, and retracing his steps to England, the secretary posted forward with the intention of overtaking Throckmorton, who, in the meantime, had been dispatched by Elizabeth on a mission to Scotland. The latter was commanded to communicate to Mary the resolution of the English Privy Council, to intimate her own entire disapproval of the proposed marriage with Darnley, and to take measures for preventing its consummation. The two ambassadors, having met at Alnwick, proceeded together into Scotland.

Lethington has been charged with baseness and treachery in neglecting to carry out the instructions communicated by Beaton. Doubtless, he was chargeable with disobedience; and, in venturing to incur the displeasure of his sovereign, he acted a bold and hazardous part. But this very fact supplies us with the key to his otherwise inexplicable conduct. It was his interest, as we have seen, to give effect to the commands to Mary; and, in failing to do this, he must have been influenced by considerations more praiseworthy than those of a personal character. These, therefore, could have been no other than a regard for the interests of the queen and the safety of her realm. It was not difficult to anticipate the consequences of the delivery of such a message as that with which Mary had entrusted him. To Elizabeth it would certainly have been deemed a sufficient provocation to justify the suspension of all friendly relations between the two countries, and giving rise to some hasty expression of her unbounded indignation would have created an irreparable breach, and have violently rent asunder the few remaining ties which still linked together the two queens.

Shortly after the departure of Beaton, the convention of nobles, summoned by command of Mary to deliberate on her marriage, assembled at Stirling, on the 15th of May. With the exception of Lord Ochiltree and one or two others, this meeting was attended by the whole of the most influential of the Scottish nobility. There were present—the Duke of Chatelherault; the Earls of Argyle, Moray, Morton, Glencairn, Atholl, Crawford, Eglington, Cassillis, Rothes, and Caithness; the Lords Hume, Gray, Glamis, Borthwick, Yester, Fleming, Livingston, Semple, Ross, Lindsay, Lovat, Boyd, and Somerville. In addition to these noblemen and barons, there were present—the officers of state, the secretary, the treasurer, the justice-clerk, and the advocate; together with the commendators of Holyrood, Kilwinning, Jedburgh, St. Colm's Inch, and Balmerinock.* In the midst of this illustrious assemblage of the Estates of her realm, the queen announced her resolution of contracting an alliance by marriage with the son of the Earl of Lennox, Henry Lord Darnley. No opposition was offered to the proposed measure. Many of the nobles openly expressed their approbation, and the few who, like Moray, were averse to the marriage, did not venture to avow their sentiments. Probably their silent acquiescence was owing to the overwhelming majority of the barons by whom Mary was supported in the proposition she had made. Not satisfied, however, with this result, the queen gave orders that another convention should be summoned to meet at Perth, for the purpose of procuring the final consent of the nobility to her union with Darnley, and the period fixed for the consummation of the marriage. This meeting was appointed for the 22nd of June.

In the meantime, while the Convention at Stirling was still sitting, Mary conferred upon Darnley the honour of knighthood, and immediately afterwards created him Lord of Ardmanach and Earl of Ross. After having taken the oaths, and the ceremonial being completed by his being girt with the sword, Darnley, rising from his knees, himself conferred the dignity of knighthood upon fourteen gentlemen of ancient and loyal families who knelt before the throne.† In the midst of this imposing ceremonial, the queen was informed of the arrival of the English ambassador,

Arrival of an English ambassador. Throckmorton, who had hastened to Stirling, and now urgently demanded an audience. Orders having been given for his admittance to her presence, he immediately delivered the message with which he was entrusted from his royal mistress. The language he employed was harsh and vehement. He expressed the strong determination of his mistress to oppose with all her influence the proposed marriage—remonstrated with Mary on account of what he termed her strange and unadvised proceedings—animadverted in bitter terms on the presumption of Lennox and Darnley, her own subjects, who, without giving any previous notice of their intentions, had dared to engage in such an enterprise. To this communication Mary replied with firmness and spirit: "That as soon as she had formed her resolution on the subject of her marriage with Darnley, she had at once made known her intentions to Elizabeth, which was all that she had ever promised to do. As to her good sister's was made in conformity to the queen's wishes, as communicated by Mr. Randolph. She had rejected all foreign suitors, and had chosen an Englishman, descended from the blood-royal of both kingdoms, and the first prince of the blood in England; and one whom she believed would, for these reasons, be acceptable to the subjects of both realms."*

It must have been a difficult matter for the ambassador to answer this spirited address; the more so as it had truth for its foundation. This, however, he attempted, as he tells us: "That he took occasion to impugn her sayings by the very words of Mr. Randolph's commission, containing these three articles. First. For her own contentation. Next. The allowance of her people. Thirdly. That her choice be such as the amity which is now betwixt us, not only for our own persons, but also for our nation, may be continued, and not dissolved nor diminished; proving to her by many and probable arguments, that Lord Darnley did not satisfy the contents of that liberal permission, whereupon she did chiefly ground herself to have your majesty's allowance."† Mary had proposed further honours for the acceptance of Darnley, and intended to create him Duke of Albany; but in deference to the wishes of Throckmorton, she consented to postpone this ceremony.‡

‡ "The Lord Darnley received the honours specified—viz. knighthood, the lordship of Ardmanach, and the earldom of Ross—the creation of the Duke of Albany only excepted, the conferring of which honour this queen, at my leaving taking (which was the 19th of May), did promise to defer till she might hear how your majesty would accept

Exasperated at the conduct of the Scottish queen, and by no means mollified by the answer communicated to her by Throckmorton, Elizabeth proceeded to the adoption of more severe measures. On pretence of having detected the Countess of Lennox in some dangerous intrigues with the Catholics, and particularly with the Earl of Northumberland, she ordered her to be arrested and imprisoned. Immediately afterwards she summoned her Privy Council (12th June, 1565), for the purpose of solemn deliberation on the vexed question of the marriage of the Queen of Scots.

The meetings of this council—the character of their proceedings, and the conclusions arrived at—are of some importance, and an authentic account of them has been preserved by Cecil. From this it appears, that two questions were proposed for the serious consideration of the council. First. What perils would probably ensue to the queen's majesty and her realm, upon the marriage of the Queen of Scotland with Lord Darnley. Second. What was necessary to be done in order to counteract the same. To these questions very full answers were returned by the council.

"The perils," says Cecil, "being many, were reduced by some councillors to only two—First, that by this marriage, the queen's majesty being unmarried, a great number in this realm, not of the worst subjects, might be alienated in their minds from their natural duties to her majesty, to depend upon the success of this marriage of Scotland as a means to establish the succession of both the crowns in the issue of the same marriage, and to favour all devices and practices that should tend to the advancement of the Queen of Scots. Under the second peril, it was observed that, considering the chief foundation of that party which favoured the marriage of the Lord Darnley was laid upon the trust of such as were Papists, as the only mean left to restore the religion of Rome, it was plainly to be seen that, both in this realm and in Scotland, the Papists would most favour, maintain, and fortify, the marriage of the Lord Darnley; and would, for the furtherance of their faction in religion, devise all means and positions that could be within this realm to disturb the estate of the queen's majesty and the peace of the realm, and consequently to achieve their purpose by force rather than fail."*

This document, which may be regarded as a minute of the Privy Council, then proceeds to remind Elizabeth of the conduct of Mary from the time when, in conjunction with her husband Francis, she assumed the arms and style of England, down to the present the proceedings, and answer to my legation. Elizabeth was extremely indignant at this delay, and Lord Darnley happening to be the first person who informed her of this postponement, he, giving way to his resentment and passionate temper, drew his dagger, and threatened to strike that nobleman.

in which her policy was assuming an aspect even more alarming.

"It is also to be remembered," remarks Cecil in continuation, "that seeing now, before this attempt of marriage, it was found and manifestly seen, that in every corner of the realm the faction that most favoured the Scottish title is grown stout and bold—yea, seen manifestly in this court, both in hall and chamber, it could not be but (except good heed were speedily given to it) the same faction would speedily increase by this marriage, and by the practice of the author thereof, and grow so great and dangerous, as the redress thereof would be almost desperate. And to this purpose it was to be remembered how, of late, in perusing of the substance of the justices of peace in all the countries of the realm, scantily a third part was found fully assured to be trusted in the matter of religion, upon which only string the Queen of Scots title doth hang; and some doubts might be that the friends of the Earl of Lennox had more knowledge of this than was meet, and thereby made their vaunt now in Scotland, that their party was now so great in England that the queen's majesty dared not attempt to oppose the marriage."

It will be seen from this document, and its remarkable admissions, in the first place, that the Catholic party had, from whatever cause, received of late considerable accessions of strength, and had become, on this account, a source of uneasiness and even alarm to the English Privy Council. This circumstance, as is justly observed by Cecil, could not be unknown at the Scottish court; and while it raised the expectations of the adherents of the ancient faith, must have tended at the same time to confirm Mary in her determination at once to carry out her intentions with regard to her marriage with Darnley, and to assert her claims as heiress-apparent to the English crown.*

Another fact brought out in this minute of the Privy Council is, that there were two parties at the English court who held opposite opinions on the subject of Mary's marriage with Darnley; and that those who approved of her intentions in that matter were no mean or contemptible faction. Cecil, indeed, expressed himself in terms of the strongest aversion to this union, and that statesman may be regarded as the head and representative of the party who honestly and consistently opposed themselves to this measure. Apparently, Elizabeth allowed herself to be guided in her sentiments and policy by the opinions of her minister, and to regard the marriage with unqualified disapprobation. Grounds, however, are not wanting for entertaining the supposition, that the displeasure manifested by her on this occasion was, to use the quaint language of a French historian, mere grimace. Confessedly this union secured several points which had been to Elizabeth a subject of some anxiety. It delivered her at once from the dangers apprehended should Mary resolve upon contracting an alliance with any of the continental princes, as had been proposed by Austria and Spain. It extricated her from the difficulties in which she had involved herself through the treacherous policy pursued with regard to Leicester, and it enabled her to retain that nobleman at court. These reasons were not without their due weight in Scotland, and served to convince the people that probably the anger of Elizabeth was mere dissimulation. This, in fact, as we learn from Throckmorton, was the observation made whenever Randolph affected to anticipate with dread the results of Elizabeth's resentment.

* At this time, indeed, it was currently reported in Scotland, that Elizabeth herself was every day manifesting a greater tendency towards, if not the doctrines, at least the practices and ceremonies of the Roman Church. It is a matter of fact that she had determined to impose a particular habit upon the English clergy, copied from that worn by the clergy of the Church of Rome. It was said also, that she had publicly reprov'd a preacher, who was probably animadverting on some of the Popish practices, commanding him to keep to his text or else to hold his peace. She had been farther seen to wear a rosary and a crucifix; and Bonner had been allowed with impunity to make the audacious statement, that there was not one real bishop in England.—M.S. Letter, State Paper Office, Randolph to Cecil, 30th March, 1565

We have said that Cecil was honest and consistent in his determination to oppose this marriage with Darnley. His efforts to prevent its consummation were strenuous and unceasing, and were seconded with zeal and energy by Bedford and others in England, and by Randolph in Scotland. This opposition was founded on the apprehension, that not only would the Protestant religion be endangered by the elevation of Darnley to the throne, but what, perhaps, in their estimation was equally to be deplored, the influence of Elizabeth in the Scottish kingdom would be materially weakened, if not totally subverted. These were evils which the ministers of Elizabeth felt themselves called upon, if possible, to avert at all hazards.

In the paper from which we have already quoted, we find that answers were returned by the Privy Council to the second question proposed to its consideration, viz., what was most expedient to be done in order to avoid the dangers anticipated from this marriage. First, they observed, that the time was come for the queen majesty's own marriage, and that she should hold them with no long delay; secondly, that measures of a decided character should be at once taken to advance and fortify the profession of religion, both in Scotland and in England; thirdly, that proceedings should be immediately commenced to secure the breaking off of this contemplated marriage; or, if that was impossible, to provide against the perils apprehended from its consummation; lastly, "That some intelligence should be used in Scotland with the party opposed to the union, and comfort given them from time to time."*

We may here allude to the shameful system of misrepresentation adopted about this time by Randolph. That envoy had, so long as Mary was sub-Randolph's mis- vident to the wishes of the English representations. sovereign, uniformly praised her conduct in the administration of public affairs.

 Repeatedly he had assured Elizabeth that the Protestants of Scotland had every reason to be satisfied with the toleration they enjoyed. The foundations of the reformed religion, he said, were perfectly secure, and its adherents were blessed with the favour of their queen, and unfettered liberty of conscience, as abundantly as heart could wish.
 To speak of Mary in such terms was no more than justice to that queen. In her exertions for the Protestant party she had incurred the displeasure of the Catholics, and the latter had been treated with remarkable severity. "No sooner, however," it has been well remarked, "did Mary fix her choice on Darnley—no sooner did it appear to Randolph that the English faction in Scotland was likely to lose ground, and to be superseded in their authority, than the letters of this pliant envoy abounded with complaints and misrepresentations."
 The reformed religion was described as not only in danger, but already ruined, and the godly undone.
 The queen was said to be fallen into universal contempt. "We are told that her whole character had altered in a few days; that even her countenance and beauty were decayed, so that many thought she was bewitched; and lastly, that an irresistible party had resolved to oppose the marriage, and avert the ruin of the country."* Such statements were wholly without foundation, and discover to us very forcibly the unscrupulous character of the man, who, in his eagerness to forward the views and flatter the prejudices of the mistress to whose service, it must be confessed, he was sincerely devoted, did not hesitate to pronounce, as already experienced, the evils and disasters which, even in the gloomiest minds, were only matters of anticipation.

Anxious to the last to keep on good terms with her sister of England, Mary now dispatched to the court of that country, on a friendly mission, Hay, her master of requests, a man of great ability and unquestionable prudence. He was instructed to employ every argument to gain Elizabeth's consent to the proposed marriage; to intimate that, "though in her heart she had determined to have my Lord of Ross as her husband—her whole nobility agreeing in this purpose—yet, having consideration of their amity, she was content to delay and suspend the final accomplishment and solemnization of her marriage for a convenient season;" and to express her willingness, if Elizabeth were so inclined, to appoint commissioners to meet with those from England, who should labour to adjust the differences between the kingdoms.† In addition, Hay was directed to address a spirited remonstrance to the queen on account of the severe and unjust proceedings which had been taken against the Countess of Lennox.

 "We cannot but think," she says in her instructions to the envoy, "very strange the sharp treating and handling of our dear cousin, the Lady Margaret Douglas, and can judge no other but this evil and hard entreating is for our name."

Before this ambassador arrived in England, Elizabeth adopted more decided and violent measures. The Countess of Lennox, who had for some time continued under restraint, was now committed to the Tower. A summons was dispatched to Lennox, commanding in the most solemn most peremptory manner, on their part of allegiance as English subjects, the attendance of himself and Darnley at the court of their sovereign.
 About this time, also, and previous to the visit of Hay, Elizabeth addressed a letter to the Scottish queen, similar in terms to former communications, and with an intimation that her views as to the marriage remained unchanged. Randolph also received instructions to continue his intimate relations with Moray and others of the disaffected nobility, and to assure them that, so long as they intended nothing but the maintenance of religion to the honour of God, the upholding of their sovereign's estate, and the nourishing of the amity between the two realms, she would favourably regard their state, and lend to them her protection against the malice of their enemies. This message is an indent demonstration that Elizabeth supported and fomented the incipient rebellion which she saw was manifestly arising in the unhappy kingdom of Scotland. And so long as the designs of the nobility were masked under the Heretick hypocritical pretext of maintaining the interests of religion—although she was quite aware that their object was very different—long she professed herself willing and determined to afford them countenance and assistance. In plain terms, Randolph was directed to declare that should they, for the furtherance of their projects, consider it expedient "to keep great forces for their defence," they were to be careful that their expenses should be as moderate as possible; and if there were beyond their means, she would not be wanting to her aid. In short, "you will," says she, "give them this advice—neither to make greater expense than their security makes necessary; nor less which may bring danger."*

Apart from this perfidious policy of Elizabeth, and their knowledge of it, it may be questioned whether, in their opposition to the marriage, the nobility would have proceeded to extremities. No doubt Moray entertained a strong opinion in Darnley, and, as we have seen, freely refused to sanction his union with the queen. Yet, without the countenance and active support of the English sovereign, he would certainly have desisted from making any effectual opposition to this match and alliance. As it was, the influence and projects held out to them by Randolph, in the name of the mistress, urged them to the adoption of measures which they would not otherwise have dared to propose. Now that they considered this union as inevitable, and all their remonstrances had been unavailing, they debated among themselves whether it would not be possible to apprehend Lennox and his son by violence, and convey them both as prisoners into England.

To this desperate step they were the more inclined, on account of the conduct of Darnley, whose haughtiness and insolence had become insupportable.

The pride and insolence of Darnley. Of this a description is given by Randolph, in the following terms, which, from other sources, we know to be authentic. "Riccio," says he, "is he that now worketh all—chief secretary to the queen, and only governor to her good man. The bruits here are wonderful—men talk very strange—the hazard towards him [Darnley] and his house marvellous great; his pride intolerable; his words not to be borne, but where no man dare to speak again. He spareth not also, in token of his manhood, to let some blows fall where he knoweth that they will be taken. Such passions, such furies as I hear say that he will sometimes be in, is strange to believe. What cause this people hath to rejoice of this their worthy prince, I leave it to the world to think. When they have said all," continues Randolph with bitterness, "and thought what they can, they can find nothing but that God must send him a short end, or themselves a miserable life, to live under such an estate and government as this is like to be."

The same letter makes a very significant allusion to the feeling prevalent in the country, that the marriage with Darnley, and all the misfortunes to the realm which might possibly result from that connection, were traceable to the ruinous policy of the English queen. "What comfort," he goes on to say, "can they look for at the queen's majesty's hands, or what support, if aught should be attempted, seeing the most part are persuaded that to this end he was sent into this country? I spare here to speak so much as I have heard; and knowing so little of the queen's mind as I do, I know not what counsel or advice to give."

Nevertheless, this able and wily man was perfectly aware of the secret inclinations of his mistress, and that nothing would have pleased her better than the existence of disturbances in the country, which would in some way excuse her interference with its internal affairs. Scotland, she appears to have determined, should enjoy no peace and no security, unless in that kingdom her influence was paramount. Knowing then the mind of Elizabeth, he takes occasion to bring before her the hazardous position of Moray, who was exposed to great danger in consequence of his opposition to the marriage, and therefore, as he sagaciously insinuated, in consequence of the support he had given to her majesty's views. He then throws out a hint that, as it was probable she would in the end assist the discontented nobles, it would be better to do so at once, as the object in view would be gained with greater ease and at less cost. "To see so many in hazard," he remarks, "as now stand in danger of life, land, and goods, it is great pity to think; only to remedy this mischief he [Darnley] must be taken away, or such as he hateth find such support, that whatsoever he intendeth to another may light upon himself. A little now spent in the beginning yieldeth double fruit. What were it for the queen's majesty, if she list not to do it by force, with the expense of three or four thousand pounds to do with this country as she would?"*

It may now not improperly be inquired, what were the views of the Protestants, as a party, in relation to Queen Mary's marriage with Lord Darnley. We have seen the opposition of their leaders, Moray and Lethington; but in the case of these men it cannot be maintained that they acted solely on the principle that the security of the Reformed faith was endangered. That such was not their opinion may be gathered from their own statement to Cecil, in a letter from Moray to that statesman, written in the previous year. Their sentiments, thus expressed, were to this effect—that the presence of Lennox in Scotland, even did that nobleman succeed in forming an alliance with the most illustrious and powerful personage of the state, would not be influential enough to disturb the foundation on which the national religion now rested. Nothing had since occurred to justify their present or pretended fears that this state of things would be totally changed by Mary's marriage. But the Reformer himself, and along with him a great body of Protestants, were resolutely bent on opposing this union. The conduct of Knox in this matter is susceptible of an easy explanation. From the first accession of Mary to the throne he had been apprehensive of the evils which seemed almost inevitable, in the case of a Protestant country governed by a popish sovereign. With these views, he had always acted a consistent and uncompromising part. Romanism was an elaborated system of idolatry, and as such, he would have destroyed it root and branch. So long as it was even tolerated—so long as the mass was said even in the privacy of the queen's chamber, so long he believed the religion of the country endangered, and, therefore, against that toleration he was firm and unwavering in his habitual protest. The prospect of Mary's union with a papist must have excited in his mind the most anxious concern, and the most melancholy forebodings: miserable results to the cause of freedom and of truth could not fail to follow in the train of such an alliance. In opposing it with all his influence—in bringing to bear upon the minds of men all the resources of his powerful intellect and indomitable spirit, to induce men to regard it with the same condemnation and abhorrence as himself, he acted from the purest motives, in consistency with the whole course of his useful and laborious life, and from a firm conviction of the incalculable evils about to be entailed upon the nation.

We now come to speak of circumstances which, from the obscurity in which their real character is involved, have given rise to much supposition and counterplots of Moray and Darnley.

Argyle, on the one hand, and Darnley and his associates, on the other. There can be little doubt of the reality of both of these opposite conspiracies, but the statements which have been made by various authors regarding their details, as they are extremely conflicting, so they must be received with caution. Some historians positively deny that there are any grounds for believing in the accusations made against Darnley, as cherishing designs against the life of Moray. This, however, is plainly asserted by Buchanan, who states that a plan was formed to murder him at Perth, and even describes the manner in which this plot was to have been executed.*

The situation of Moray at this time in relation to the court, his determined opposition to the queen's marriage, the dangers to be anticipated from his enmity, the strong resentment and violent passions of Darnley, all serve to lend the colour of probability to the existence of some such scheme as that now described. Moray himself alleged that his life was threatened, and on this account he refused to attend the convention of the nobility which had been summoned to meet at St. Johnston, near Perth, on the 22nd of June. On the other hand, the imputation of this crime was indignantly repelled by the parties accused. Lennox and his son, we are informed by Randolph, sent Mr. John Hay with a message to Moray, expressing his good-will towards him, disclaiming the treacherous design which had been laid to his charge, and offering to do battle with any one who should prefer the accusation.† Anxious that this assurance letters of safe-conduct, signed not only by herself, but by the members of her privy council. This safe-conduct permitted his appearance with a guard of no less than eighty attendants; but he did not feel himself justified in obeying this call, and his refusal served in a measure to exculpate Darnley.

While it is certain that a plot of some kind had been formed by Moray against the Earl of Ross, its character and extent cannot be accurately defined. Some historians have given an elaborate account of this conspiracy, as if they were in-

* "The plan was this: Moray being called to Perth, where the queen then was with a few attendants, was there to enter into conversation with Darnley, and as nobody doubted but Moray would express himself with plainness and freedom, a quarrel was to ensue, when David Riccio was to strike the first blow, and the others present were to consummate the deed."—Buchanan, vol. ii. p. 463.

timately conversant with all its details, while it is notorious that these are involved in much uncertainty. It must be acknowledged, that whatever were the intentions of Moray with regard to his treatment of Darnley, he had at least resolved to seize upon his person. A message had been dispatched to Randolph to ascertain whether, in the event of Lennox and his son being taken, Elizabeth would receive them as prisoners. To this it was answered, that the queen would receive her own subjects "in what sort ever they come." Thus encouraged in their proceedings, Moray, Argyle, Lord Boyd, and others of the dissatisfied nobility, determined to attack the party of the queen, as she rode from Perth to Callander.*

The plan of the conspirators was to seize Darnley, either in the narrow dale called the Pass of Hume, a few miles from Perth, or in a deep ravine to the west of the hill of Benarty, near Kinross. According to the account of Randolph, in which, however, full confidence cannot be placed, Moray had intended "to have carried the queen's grace to St. Andrew's, and the Lord Darnley to Castle Campbell, a house of the Earl of Argyle."† By the same authority we are informed how, by her vigilance and presence, the queen was enabled to defeat these intentions. Having returned from Inverkeithing to Perth on the 30th of June, she obtained some information of the plot, and immediately directed the Earl of Atholl and Lord Ruthven to convey her to Callander House, near Faldut, on the following morning. Mary, in carrying out her intentions, left the city at five in the morning, accompanied by the noblemen now mentioned, and an escort of three hundred horse. Before Moray had the least suspicion of her movements, she had passed through Kinross, reached North Queensferry, crossed the Firth of Forth, and arrived in safety at Callander House. Two hours after she had passed, Argyle appeared at Kinross, but found that his journey had been to no purpose. Mary remained at Callander till the 4th of July, on which day she returned to Edinburgh, by way of Linlithgow.‡ The measures she now adopted were

• Melvil says, "The Duke of Cumberland, by letter of Argyle, Moray, Glencairn, Gordon, and others, obtained the said marriage, who after they had seized the Lord Darnley, in the queen's company, and to have sent her into England as they thought fit, but she was taken from their mind, but it was an extraordinary circumstance, that until the queen was in danger of being seized, she was as they had failed in their wicked intention, they did plainly to their arms of rebellion."—Keith, vol. ii. p. 333.

† Randolph to Cecil. Keith, vol. ii. p. 333.
‡ Both Randolph and Knox declare that they also attended a visit to this place was to be made by the Duke of Lennox, the Lord Livingston, Knox says that he was also present, and that he attended a Protestant service. The queen was then at this time before indicated that she intended to return to Perth, the satisfaction of some of her attendants, and she was not persuaded in any respect but God, in which she was brought up, yet she would have remained in the city of Perth, in the Scriptures, and public preaching from the mouth of Mr. Erskine of Dun, the superior minister of Perth, and Mearns, for he was a wild and very passionate man, with true honesty and uprightness.

§ The circumstances of the conspiracy, as related as to the circumstances of the conspiracy, are given of which has now been given, are very clearly explained by decisive and vigorous. Having received intelligence that Argyle was preparing to attack Atholl, and that Moray was collecting his adherents for the purpose of making a demonstration at Glasgow, she dispatched messengers to both noblemen, enjoining the one instantly to disband his forces, and prohibiting the other from gathering together his followers on pain of treason. Further, she issued a summons to her subjects to assemble in arms at Edinburgh, with fifteen days' provision, to assist her in proceeding against her enemies.

In the meantime, while the convention of nobility was holding its meetings at Perth, the General Assembly was convened at Edinburgh. At this meeting several important resolutions were drawn up, bearing on the state of the country and the circumstances of the church,* urging the entire suppression of popish idolatry, and the establishment of the true religion throughout the realm. It was also declared that some fixed and regulated provision should be made for the support of the ministers of the church; that no two benefices should be held at once by the same man (in other words, that pluralities should be abolished); that a strict examination should be instituted into the appointment of all teachers of youth in schools and colleges; and that a fund should be set apart for the maintenance of the poor, out of those lands which had formerly been allotted for this purpose, whereby some relief might be afforded to the labourers of the soil, who were much oppressed in the payment of their tithes, by unreasonable and illegal exactions.†

Petition presented to the queen. Five commissioners were appointed to wait upon the queen with this petition.‡ At the head of these was the Earl of Glencairn, who immediately re-

Robertson in the following note:—"Buchanan and Randolph, in their accounts of the conspiracy against Moray, differ widely in almost every circumstance. The accounts of the attempts upon Darnley are not more consistent. Melville alleges that the design of the conspirators was to carry Darnley a prisoner into England. The proposal made to Randolph agrees with this. The latter authority says, that they intended to carry the queen to St. Andrew's, and Darnley to Castle Campbell. The lords, in their declaration, affirm the design of the conspirators to have been to murder Darnley and his father, to confine the queen in Leithen during life, and to usurp the government. To believe implicitly whatever they find in an ancient paper, is a folly to which antiquaries are extremely prone. Ancient papers, however, often contain nothing more than the slanders of a party and the lie of the day. The declaration of the nobles, too, is of this kind—it is plainly rancorous, and written in the very heat of faction. Many things asserted in it are evidently false or exaggerated. Let Moray and his confederates be as ambitious as we can suppose, they must have had some pretences, and plausible ones too, before they could venture to imprison their sovereign for life, and to seize the reins of government; but, at that time, the queen's conduct had afforded no colourable excuse for proceeding to such extremities."—Robertson, vol. i. p. 333.

paired to Perth, where her majesty was then residing. Until the twentieth of August no answer was returned to these demands; on that day, however, a letter was received by the commissioners, expressing the queen's sentiments in temperate language, but holding out no prospect of her compliance with their requests. She was not convinced, she said, that there was any impiety in the mass; and therefore her loving subjects should not press her to receive a religion which was not approved of by her conscience; nor, indeed, had she any intention of forsaking the religion in which she had been nourished and brought up. As for the establishment of religion in the body of the realm, she declared that this could not be done without the consent of the three Estates; that she was ready to abide by the decision of her parliament on this important subject; and that until the matter could be deliberated upon with due solemnity, she would take care that no man should be oppressed or troubled on account of his religion.* This answer proved very unsatisfactory to the Reformers, and a further remonstrance was directed to be made to her majesty.

Moray and the confederate lords now determined to appeal to Elizabeth to afford Moray appeals them the countenance and support to Elizabeth which they had reason to believe for support.

she would not be unwilling to grant. Accordingly, they represented that the queen was resolved to overthrow the Protestant religion, and to bring to an end the friendly intercourse that now subsisted between the two kingdoms. This application for assistance, and the reasons alleged in its justification, are formally brought before the English Secretary of State, in a letter from Randolph to Cecil. After alluding to the notorious fact, that Elizabeth had encouraged Moray and his party to enter on the course of opposition which they were now pursuing, and that they relied upon the promises she had made of assistance in their enterprise, he proceeds to remark, that "the said earls [Moray and Argyle] do see their sovereign determined to overthrow the received religion, and sore bent against those who desire that the amity between the realms should be continued. Which two points they are bound in conscience to maintain and defend, and are resolved to provide for their sovereign's estate better than at this time she can consider thereof herself.† Wherefore their lordships became most humble suitors to the queen's majesty, that it will please her highness to give unto them some such support as will enable them to bear out to that end—some such sums of money as will provide for their keeping together. They think that if her majesty would bestow only three thousand pounds for this year, they shall be able very well (except some foreign force be brought against them) to bring this realm to peace and quietness."*

To these communications Elizabeth replied by Elizabeth's many assurances of sympathy, and crooked policy. vague promises of support. The time was not yet come for openly declaring herself. In reality, she was not displeased with the existence of disturbances in Scotland; but desirous of still maintaining the appearance, at least, of a friendly disposition towards Mary, she refused to compromise herself by extending to the discontented nobles her active support.†

Meanwhile, Mary proceeded to adopt the most vigorous measures against Moray and his adherents. She sent a herald to Glasgow to forbid, under the pain of treason, a meeting which they intended to hold in that city. The meeting of the three Estates was prorogued from July to September. A proclamation was issued to the lieges to meet their sovereign immediately in arms in the capital, with fifteen days' provision, to provide against any sudden disturbance on the part of the discontented barons; and private letters were at the same time addressed to the principal nobles and gentry of the kingdom, requiring their instant attendance.‡

Matters were rapidly approaching a crisis; Moray, as we have seen, had absented himself from the convention of the Estates at Perth, on the plea that Lennox and Darnley had formed a conspiracy to assassinate him there; § and Mary now called upon him to appear and make good his charge, which these noblemen indignantly denied.¶ In a letter, subsequently written by her to Paul de Foix, she thus narrates the steps which she took in connection with this affair:—"Moray," she says, "disappointed in his first attempt to break the marriage, bethought himself of another way of doing it, by spreading a report among my subjects that the Earl of Lennox and the king his son would have him murdered, because he had not consented to my marriage without the advice of all the nobles; and, perceiving that they would carefully consider the matter before they permitted me to marry, the said Earl of Moray endeavoured all he could to persuade my subjects that the king had the evil nature of a homicide, in order to render them more reluctant to my marriage. Not wishing his false accusations to be believed among mine own, I assembled all the lords of my council in the town of Edinburgh, and explained to them that the Earl of Moray had complained that they had desired to have him murdered; and, as I allowed justice to have free course with every one, I prayed them to make the Earl of Moray prove what he had said of the king [Darnley] and the Earl of Lennox; and in case it should be proved to be as he said, I would not permit such injury to be done to the person of him whom I regarded as a brother. In order to do this, I, by their advice, sent for the Earl of Moray, who was in his house, to come and explain the grounds of his complaint before me, assuring him at the same time that I would not proceed any further to the marriage, if the Earl of Lennox and the king should be found guilty of conspiring his death. I sent him at the same time such guarantees for his safety, as every one knows he could have no reason to refuse to come; nevertheless, he refused to do so. I then sent a second time two of the lords of council to him, assuring him he should have a fair hearing, if he would enter into the town of which he had complained. To this he replied—"That he could not prove what had been said; but it might suffice me that he believed it, for it was true." Now, seeing that he would not prove his accusations, and I could not believe that the Earl of Lennox and the king had wished to commit such wickedness, I sent to him for the third time a message, giving him to understand, that if he did not come to maintain and prove his word, I would declare him a rebel, and proceed against him as such. Perceiving me determined by all means to search out the truth, with intent to punish whoever should be found guilty, whether it were the accused or the accused, and fearing he should be convicted as a liar, he took himself off into Argyle, where he began to make assemblies and innovations, to seduce all the nobles to take up arms against me, strengthening himself with the duke [of Cumberland]."

* Letter from Mary Stewart to Paul de Foix, Dec. 6, 1565. Labanoff, vol. i. p. 308. Annales, vol. ii. p. 133. The reality of this conspiracy, as well as that which Moray is alleged to have formed against Mary during the journey from Perth, has given occasion to many disputes and much conjecture. Some have held the design was formed against the life of Moray; others that question the truth of the conspiracy against Mary. There seems, however, to be good reason to believe both; though the seal and evidence of each would have added to each man's exaggerated accusations. The following arguments favour a private conspiracy against Moray which was intended against Moray.—1. The first party mentioned by Buchanan, book xv. ch. 40. 2. The English ambassador writes to Cecil that Moray was certainly intended to be design was held to murder him at Perth, and that the manner in which this plot was to have been executed, Keith, vol. ii. p. 333. 3. Moray himself mentioned and publicly affirmed that such a design was formed against him (Keith, Appendix), and though he was called upon by the queen to bring legal evidence of the conspiracy, and to conduct against her while he came to prove his purpose (ibid.), yet whenever accused, Mary's accusations, and the spirit of those who relied on her evidence, would have done it any proof of his guilt that he had the means to risk his person on such a venture. 4. The false accusations of Darnley, the husband of his enemy, and the manners of the king, make the English ambassador's conduct less improbable.—11. That Moray and his party were resolved to seize Darnley's person, while he was on his way, is certain. 1. From the express invitation of the king, although Buchanan and Keith affirm against all probability to represent this as an idle rumour. 2. The queen was put to Randolph, whether the Government of Scotland would Randolph, the crafty agent of Cecil, continued zealously to advocate the cause of Moray and his friends, and to urge upon his royal mistress the policy of rendering them prompt and effective aid. His letters show that he was not at all scrupulous as to the means which he employed to forward his designs, and that the accounts which he transmitted to the English court respecting the state of affairs in Scotland were in many points entirely at variance with truth. The Scottish queen, he said, had "credit none at all, friendship with few." "She is so much altered," he adds, "from that majesty that I have seen in her, from that modesty that I have wondered at to be in her, that she is not now counted by her own subjects to be the woman she was." On the other hand, he represented the discontented barons as so powerful, that they required only the aid of some money from England to enable them to compel the queen to alter her policy, and to submit to their wishes. "My Lord of Moray," he says, "is grieved to see these extreme follies in his sovereign; he lamenteth the state of this country, that tendeth to utter ruin; he feareth that the nobility shall be forced to assemble together to do her honour and reverence, as they are in duty bound, but so provide for the state that it do not utterly perish, the whole country being now broken, and every man living in such discontentment as they do."*

Elizabeth was probably aware that these state-ments were at variance with the truth, and they certainly failed to induce her to assist the discontented barons with the money which they so earnestly solicited. It appears, however, that she had directed her ambassador to intercede for Moray and his associates; for, in a letter from Randolph to Cecil, of date 21st July, he says: "Yesterday I had audience of the queen, to whom I delivered my message, word by word as I had it in writing. To which she said:

That she took in very good part the queen my mistress's advice; but for these,' saith she, 'whom your mistress calls my best subjects, I can't esteem them so, nor do they deserve to be accounted of, that will not do my commands; and therefore my good sister must not be offended though I do that against them which they deserve.'" Randolph then addressed himself to Lennox and Darnley, reminding them of Lennox and his son if they were carried prisoners to this place. This plainly shows that some such design was in hand, and Randolph did not discourage it by the answer which he gave (Keith, vol. ii. p. 307). 3. The precipitation with which the queen retired, and the reason she gave for this sudden flight, are mentioned by Randolph (ibid.). 4. A great part of the Scottish nobles, and among these the Earls of Argyll and Rothes, who were themselves privy to the design, assert the reality of the conspiracy (Goodall, vol. ii. p. 358). All these circumstances leave little room to doubt of the truth of both conspiracies."—Robertson, vol. i. p. 295, Note. Some of the enemies of Knox have affirmed that he was implicated in the conspiracy to seize Darnley; but the evidence adduced is utterly insufficient to bear out this accusation. the peremptory order which Elizabeth had given them to return to England, and requiring from them a plain and direct answer; but from both he received a decided refusal. Iennox declared that he thought it dangerous to place himself within the power of one who, without any just reason, had treated his wife with such harshness; while Darnley informed him that he acknowledged no other duty or obedience but to the Scottish queen, whom he served and honoured; "and seeing," he added, "the other, your mistress, is so envious of my good fortune, I doubt not but she may have need of me, as you shall know within a few days. Wherefore, to return I intend not; I find myself very well where I am, and so purpose to keep me; and this shall be your answer." The English ambassador was so provoked at this reply, that, according to his own account, he turned his back upon the haughty and ambitious youth, and "departed without reverence or farewell." Darnley, whose head appears to have been Behaviour turned by the elevated position of Darnley.

which he was about to attain, with his characteristic presumption and imprudence, had boasted that "he and the Queen of Scots had so strong a party in England, that Queen Elizabeth had more cause to be in fear of them than they of her, and that he would like nothing better than an opportunity of leading an invasion into the northern counties;" adding, with still greater folly, "that he cared more for the Papists in England than for the Protestants in Scotland."* No wonder that Randolph should say of one so rash and headstrong, "his behaviour is such, that he is seen in open contempt of all men, even of those that were his chief friends. What shall become of him I know not, but it is greatly to be feared that he can have no long life among this people. The queen herself, being of better understanding, seeketh to frame and fashion the nature of her subject: no persuasion can alter that which custom hath made old in him. He is counted proud, disdainful, and suspicious, which kind of men this soil of any other can none bear."†

It was now the end of July, and Mary, undeterred by the menaces of Elizabeth, or the opposition of Moray and his associates, gave public notice of her intention to take Darnley for her husband. The researches of Prince Labanoff, however, have brought to light a contemporary record, which proves that, nearly four months before the public solemnization of their nuptials, Queen Mary and her cousin were privately married at Stirling Castle, in the apartment of David Riccio, which had been fitted up for that purpose as a Romish chapel.‡ The proclamation of the banns of marriage took place in the Canon-gate Church, on the 22nd of July, 1565, the day on which Chisholm, Bishop of Dunblane, arrived from

Rome with the Papal dispensation for the marriage.* On the 23rd, Darnley was created Duke of Albany; and on the 28th, Mary issued a public proclamation, enjoining her subjects henceforth to give him the title of king, and directing all letters and writs from that time to be made in their joint names, as King and Queen of Scotland conjointly—a step equally illegal and unwise. Next day, being Sunday, the 29th of July, at six in the morning, the nuptial ceremony was performed according to the Roman Catholic ritual, by Sir John Sinclair, Dean of Restalrig and Bishop of Brechin.† “She was led into the chapel,” says Randolph, “by the Earls of Lennox and Atholl, and there she was left until her husband came, who also was conveyed by the same lords. The ministers, two priests, did there receive them. The banns were asked a third time, and an instrument taken by a notary that no man objected to them, or alleged any cause why the marriage might not proceed. The words were spoken; the rings, which were three—the middle one a rich diamond—were put upon her finger. They then knelt together, and many prayers were said over them.” At their conclusion, Darnley kissed his bride, and retiring from the chapel with the Protestant lords, left her to hear mass alone, attended by those nobles who adhered to the ancient faith. It was regarded by some as an inauspicious omen, that Mary was habited in sable garments, resembling those which she wore for her first husband. “She had upon her back,” says Randolph, “the great wide mourning gown, not unlike unto that which she wore on the doleful day of the burial of her husband.” This, it was alleged, was the dress of a widowed Queen of France, and the royal etiquette of the period rendered it imperative for Mary to appear in it on all state occasions, till she was actually the wife of her second husband.‡

* This was rendered necessary by the fact that Mary and Darnley were first cousins. Mary was now in her twenty-third, and Darnley in his nineteenth year.

It was not even then to be resigned without a decent semblance of reluctance. After the mass was concluded, she was led back to her own chamber, where her youthful bridegroom awaited her; “and there, being required, according to the solemnity, to cast off her care, lay aside those sorrowful garments, and give herself to a pleasant life. After some pretty refusal, more for the fashion’s sake than grief of heart, she yielded them that stood by, every man that would approach, to take out a pin, and so, being committed to her ladies, changed her garments,”* and put on a costume more suited to the joyous occasion. She was then brought to the ball-room, where there was great cheer and dancing till dawn-time. The newly-married pair were conducted to their dinner with great state, and a loud flourish of trumpets, largess was cried, and money in abundance was scattered among the guests and the multitude who surrounded the palace. The queen was served by the Earl of Atholl as sewer, Morton as carver, and Crawford as cup-bearer; and the Earls of Eglington, Cassillis, and Glencairn performed the like offices for Darnley. The evening was spent in dancing and joyous revelry, and soon after supper the company retired for the night. Next day, at twelve o’clock, Mary caused her husband to be again proclaimed King of Scotland, in the presence of all the nobles who had attended the marriage; but the proclamation elicited no approving response. “No man,” observes Randolph, “said so much as Amen, saving his father, who with a loud voice cried out, ‘God save his Grace!’” † that dress while she remained in France, which proved for her the appellation of la Reine Blanche; and that she continued to wear her white dress during her widowhood, after her return to Scotland. Hence, he concludes that the queen considered white as her mourning habit, and by adopting the very opposite she indicated that her youthful widowhood had terminated. It ought to be mentioned, moreover, that a distinction and general mourning then was unknown in Scotland till 1567, only twenty-eight years before Mary’s marriage, when Magdalene of France, the first queen of her father, James V., first introduced it. It is highly probable, therefore, that Mary’s dress at her marriage was merely a matter of her own taste and choice.—Keith, vol. ii. p. 344, Note.

CHAPTER XXX.

MARY.

A.D. 1565—1567.

THE marriage of the Scottish queen took place amid troubles and dissensions; and it soon became evident that the conduct of her youthful consort was likely to aggravate, rather than to diminish her anxieties. She lavished upon him the tokens of her affection of a most devoted affection, and for her husband. a time submitted to his most unreasonable wishes and demands. According to the testimony of Sir James Melvil, "after that the queen's majesty had married my Lord Darnley, she did him great honour herself, and willed every one that would deserve her favour to do the like, and to wait upon him, so that he was well accompanied; and such as suited him only for a while came best speed of their errands."* And Randolph, who was by no means disposed to regard her conduct with a favourable eye, gives evidence to the same effect. "All honour," he says, "that may be attributed unto any man by a wife he hath it wholly and fully; all praise that may be spoken of him he lacketh not from herself; all dignities that she can indue him with are already given and granted; no man pleaseth her that contenteth not him; and what may I say more? She hath given even unto him her whole will, to be ruled and guided as himself best liketh." † From the first, however, Darnley's

His headstrong rash, headstrong, and presumptuous behaviour. behaviour showed that he was wholly unworthy of the high honour conferred upon him, and unfit for the position to which he had been raised. He resented every opposition to his will, and gave way to furious bursts of passion on the most trifling occasions. Only two days after his marriage, his conduct is thus described by Randolph:—"His words to all men against whom he conceiveth any displeasure, how unjust soever it is, be so proud and spiteful, that rather he seemeth a monarch of the world, than he that not long since we have seen and known as the Lord Darnley. He looketh now for reverence to be given him, and some there be that think him little worthy of it. She [the queen] can as much prevail with him in anything that is against his will, as your lordship may with me to persuade that I should hang myself. This last dignity out of hand, to have him proclaimed king, she would have had it deferred until it were agreed by parliament, or had been himself of twenty-one years of age, that things done in his name might have better authority. He would in no case have it deferred." ‡

The festivities which followed the royal nuptials were speedily interrupted by tidings of insurrection, and Mary soon perceived the necessity of adopting prompt and decisive steps against the discontented nobles, who sought to avail themselves of the queen's illegal stretch of prerogative, in conferring upon her husband the title and dignity of king, to stir up opposition against her authority. Three days after the marriage, Moray was again summoned to appear at court, Proceedings under the severest penalties; and, against Moray. having failed, he was denounced as a rebel, and "put to the horne;" on which he retired into Argyleshire, and secretly dispatched a messenger to Elizabeth, to implore her immediate assistance. His request was, as usual, strenuously supported by Randolph, who endeavoured to work on the fears of his royal mistress, by drawing an alarming picture of the dangers which menaced the Protestant religion, and the amity between the two kingdoms; and wrote also to the Earl of Bedford, entreating him to make a diversion in Moray's favour, by letting loose the English borderers, so as to keep the Scottish government employed in repressing the disturbances which they might excite. Elizabeth, however, was niggardly of her money, and, though willing to feed the malcontents with secret hopes of assistance, she was careful not to commit herself openly to their cause. She, therefore, declined in the meantime to send the supplies of money and soldiers which Moray and his associates so earnestly requested, and contented herself with dispatching Mr. Tamworth, one of the gentlemen of her bedchamber, to the Scottish court, to intercede with Mary in behalf of the insurgent nobles. This envoy, who, according to Camden, was "a forward, insolent man," was instructed not to acknowledge Darnley as king, and to give him no title but that which he had borne in England; but Mary, "having smelt," as Camden adds, "the nature both of the message and of the animal who brought it," refused to admit him into her presence. His message Elizabeth to was, therefore, communicated in Mary, and the answer. writing, and the answer was given in a similar form. These documents will be read with interest, as they place in a very clear point of view the insincerity of Elizabeth, and the worthlessness of the grounds of offence which she pretended at this time to have against the Scottish queen.

On the part of Elizabeth, it was alleged that her majesty had found Mary's late proceedings, both towards herself and towards her subjects, very strange, upon divers grounds. First. Elizabeth took God to witness that her offer to Mary of any of her own subjects in marriage was made sincerely and lovingly, and that she was grieved to hear that Mary, listening to false counsel, had been made to think otherwise. To this it was answered—That the Queen of Scots did not doubt Elizabeth's sincerity and uprightness in her offer of a husband from England, and that no counsel had been given to induce her to change her opinion. Second. Elizabeth was much surprised that, notwithstanding the offer made by Mary to Sir Nicolas Throckmorton to delay her marriage till the middle of August, that she might have longer time to prevail upon Elizabeth to consent to it, she had consummated that marriage, without giving her majesty any intimation, on the 29th of July, and had thereby disappointed both Elizabeth and some foreign princes, who thought as strangely of the alliance as she did. To this it was answered—That it was true that though Mary's resolution was fixed before Sir Nicolas Throckmorton came into Scotland, she had, nevertheless, promised to delay her marriage, in the hope that the doubts entertained by Elizabeth as to the propriety of the said marriage might in the meantime be removed; but that this promise was made expressly on the condition that commissioners should be appointed on both sides to discuss the matter; and that as Elizabeth refused to nominate any such commissioners, Mary was relieved from her promise; that, farther, she had good reasons, known to herself and her own people, with which no other prince needed to interfere, for consummating her marriage at the time she did; and that with regard to foreign princes thinking the marriage strange, she had a perfect knowledge of the opinions, and had obtained the express consent, of the principal and greatest princes in Christendom. Third. Elizabeth was astonished how Mary, in direct opposition to the conditions of the treaty of peace existing between England and Scotland, could detain her majesty's subjects, Lennox and Darnley, in Scotland; having allured them thither under a pretence of suits for lands, but in reality to form an alliance without her majesty's consent and license—an offence so unnatural, that the world spoke of it, and her majesty could not forget it. To this it was answered—That Mary marvelled not a little at the queen, her good sister, insisting any further upon this head; for she did not understand how it could be found strange that she detained within her realm the person with whom she had joined herself in marriage, or a Scottish earl, whom Elizabeth herself named by his Scottish title—the more especially as they both came to her with Elizabeth's consent and letters of recommendation; and that she had no doubt that the world spoke as sound sense would dictate, judging that her detaining of them was in no ways prejudicial to any treaty of peace existing between the two realms, since no annoyance was intended towards Elizabeth, her kingdom, or estate. Fourth. Elizabeth wondered that Mary's ambassador, Mr. John Hay, came to ask to be informed of her majesty's objections to the marriage, and of what she wished to be done, but had no authority either to agree to, or refuse her requests; and she, therefore, supposed that he had been sent more as a piece of empty form than for any useful purpose. To this it was answered—That Mary, though willing to hear Elizabeth's objections, if any such existed, and to endeavour to remove them, had yet expressly declared that she would make such endeavour only through the medium of commissioners mutually agreed on; and that she was still so convinced of the expediency of the match, that, though now married, she was still willing, if Elizabeth wished it, to have its propriety discussed by such commissioners. Fifth. Elizabeth begged that an explanation might be given of a sentence in one of Mary's French letters, which she found somewhat obscure, and which ran thus—"Je voudrois jamais que cela venist de vous, et que on chercher entre vengeance, j'accuse vous & tous les princes, mes allies, pour, avec eux, vous punir de ce que je vous en ai par vengeance. Vous savez assez ce que vous avez promis sur cela." To this it was answered—That Mary, by the words of her letter, as well as the passage in question, meant no other thing but to express her desire to continue in perfect friendship and good intelligence with the queen, her sister, from whom she expected such treatment as reason and nature required from one princess to another who was her cousin; and that if, as God forbid, other treatment were pursued, which Mary would not anticipate, she would do no less than lay her case before other princes, her friends and allies. Sixth. Elizabeth was grieved to see that Mary encouraged fugitives and absconders from England, and practised other devices within her majesty's realm; and that in her own kingdom, seduced by false accusations and malicious information, she raised up factions among the nobility. To this it was answered—That if the British queen really wished to assist Elizabeth, she would not be contented with such petty practices as those she was accused of towards English subjects; and that, with regard to her proceedings in her own realm, as she had never intimated with Elizabeth's order of government, not thinking it right that one state should have a finger in the internal policy of another, so she requested that Elizabeth would not meddle with hers, but trust to her discretion, as the person best interested to preserve peace and quietness. Seventh. Elizabeth warned Mary to take good heed that she did not proceed in her intentions to suppress and extirpate the religion already established in Scotland, or to effect the suppression of the Reformed in England; for that all such designs, uncharitable intentions, and devices, should be converted to the good and damage of those that imposed on them. To this it was answered—That Mary could not avoid as Elizabeth's fears for a religion upon which no innovation had ever been attempted, but for the establishment of which every arrangement had been made most agreeable to her British subjects; that as an intention to interfere with the spiritual faith of England, she never had of a hobby; but that if any practices in such effect would be condescended on, they should presently be expressed and altered; and that with regard to her designs, consultations, intelligence, and devices, such as she really engaged in would be found no nearer to more deceitful than those of her neighbours. Eighth and lastly. Elizabeth wished that Mary would not show herself so given to change as to conceive evil of the Earl of Murray, whose just deserts she had so long acknowledged, for those were plenty examples to govern, by indifference and severity, that many noblemen had been constrained to take such measures for their own security as they would otherwise never have resorted to; and that these were part of the reasons why Elizabeth was offended with Mary. To this it was answered—That Mary wished her good sister would not meddle with the affairs of her Scottish subjects any more than Mary meddled with the affairs of Elizabeth's English subjects; but that if Elizabeth desired any explanation of her conduct towards Moray, it would be willingly given, as soon as Elizabeth explained her motives for committing to the Tower Lady Margaret, Countess of Lennox, mother-in-law and aunt of Mary; and that as soon as Elizabeth stated any other grounds of offence, they should be answered as satisfactorily as the above had been.*

Having thus triumphantly replied to the English queen's irritating message, Mary, in the true spirit of conciliation, had the magnanimity to propose that the following articles should be mutually agreed upon. On the part of the King and Queen of Scotland:—First. That their majesties, being satisfied of the queen their sister's friendship, are content to assure the queen, that during the term of her life, or that of her lawful issue, they will not, directly or indirectly, attempt anything prejudicial to their sister's title to the crown of England, or in any way disturb the quietness of that kingdom. Second. They will enter into no communication with any subject or subjects of the realm of England in prejudice of their said sister and her lawful issue, or receive into their protection any subjects of the realm of England, with whom their sister may have occasion to be offended. Third. They will not enter into any league or confederation with any foreign prince, to the hurt, damage, and displeasure of the Queen and the realm of England. Fourth. They will enter into any such league and confederation with the Queen and realm of England, as shall be for the weal of the princes and subjects on both sides. And, Fifth, they will not go about to procure, in any way, alteration, innovation, or change in the religion, laws, or liberties of the realm of England, though it should please God, at any time hereafter, to call them to the succession of that kingdom. In consideration of these offers, the three following equally reasonable articles were to be agreed to on the part of England. First. That by Act of Parliament the accession to the crown, failing Elizabeth and her lawful issue, shall be established, first in the person of Mary and her lawful issue, and failing them, in the person of the Countess of Lennox and her lawful issue, by the law of God and nature entitled to the inheritance of the said crown. Second. That the second offer made by the King and Queen of Scotland be also made on the part of England. And Third, that the third offer shall be likewise mutual.† In other words, that

Elizabeth should cease to give countenance or assistance to the Scottish malcontents—a stipulation on which Mary had good reason peremptorily to insist, for she could not but suspect what was undoubtedly the truth, that Elizabeth had throughout fomented the disturbances which had taken place in Scotland. The English ambassador was at the same time informed, that “unless he would promise on his honour not to meddle with the rebels, the queen should be under the necessity of placing a guard round his house.” To this reasonable demand, Randolph replied in the most insolent terms, declaring that he would promise nothing either on honour, honesty, word, or writing; and as for guards to attend him, he threatened that they should fare full ill, unless stronger and better armed than his own servants. Lethington then requested him to withdraw to Berwick, but to this request, also, he returned a peremptory refusal.* With equal insolence, Tamworth not only refused to give Darnley the royal title, but declined to accept a passport because it bore the regal signature of Henry as well as Mary. A hint of this had probably been given to the borderers, for on his way home the arrogant envoy was waylaid, maltreated, and carried a prisoner to Hume Castle, where he was detained for some time. Randolph complained of this outrage to the Scottish queen, but was drily told that it was Tamworth's own fault in refusing the safe-conduct which was offered him.†

At this juncture, the queen manifested the hostile feelings which she now entertained towards the Earl of Moray, by restoring to favour those nobles who had long been his avowed enemies. Lord Gordon, son of the late Earl of Huntley, who had been detained a prisoner ever since his father's insurrection in the year 1562, was set at liberty, and was shortly after restored to his estates and honours; the Earl of Sutherland, an accomplice of Huntley, was recalled from banishment; and the profligate Earl of Bothwell, the “enemy of all honest men,” as he was justly termed, was invited to return into Scotland. The favour thus shown to his implacable adversaries was regarded by Moray and his associates as a proof of the inexorable resentment which Mary cherished against them, and matters were speedily brought to an extremity. On the 15th of August, Moray, the Duke, Argyle, Glencairn, Rothes, and others of the insurgent barons, having received a small supply of money ^{up arms.} from Elizabeth, appeared in arms at Ayr, and endeavoured to raise their friends and followers in the western counties. Mary declared to the English ambassador, that “she would rather lose her crown than not chastise them for their misconduct;” and, with the utmost promptitude and energy, adopted measures for the immediate suppression of the insurrection. She issued a summons to the barons and gentry of her kingdom to come to her assistance with “their whole kin, friends, and household," as she was preparing to go in person against the rebels; and so cordially was the appeal responded to, that, on the 26th of August, she was able to take the field at the head of five thousand men. In order to encourage her troops, and to show that she was determined to share with them all the dangers and fatigues of the war, she rode with pistols at her saddlebow, and is reported even to have worn a light suit of defensive armour under her embroidered riding-dress. She reached Glasgow on the 29th, expecting to meet the insurgents there, but conscious of their inferiority in numbers, and probably daunted by the unexpected celerity and vigour of the queen's movement, they did not venture to face her in the field, but turning aside towards Hamilton, they evaded the royal army and marched to Edinburgh, which they entered on the last day of August.* But all their efforts to rouse the inhabitants of that city to arms entirely failed. "They got no good of their coming," says Knox, "though they dispatched messengers northward and southward praying for succour, but all in vain. They caused to beat their drums, desiring all such men as would receive wages for the defence of the glory of God to resort the following day to the church, where they should receive good pay. But they profited little that way, neither could they in Edinburgh get any comfort or support, for none or few resorted unto them." Finding that the citizens regarded their cause with disapprobation or indifference, they addressed a letter to the queen, offering to submit their cause to be tried by the laws of their country; and declaring that they desired only that the Protestant faith should be secured against the dangers to which it was exposed, and that the administration of public affairs should be entrusted to those in whom the nation could have confidence; † but adding, that if their enemies continued to seek their lives, their blood should be dearly bought. On learning, however, that the queen was advancing against them, without waiting for a reply, they abandoned the capital with precipitation, and retired to Dumfries. From this place they dispatched Robert Melvil to the English court, to entreat that a body of troops and some ships of war should immediately be sent to their assistance. ‡

She, therefore, with her characteristic duplicity, wrote to the Earl of Bedford, remitting him three thousand pounds, one thousand of which was to be paid immediately to Moray in the most private way possible, and as if the money came from Bedford himself, and further advances might be made if required. "And when we perceive," she continued, "by your sundry letters, the earnest request of the said Earl of Moray and his associates that they might, at least, have three hundred of our soldiers to aid them, and that you also write that though we would not command you to give them aid, yet if we would but wink at your doing therein, and seem to blame you for attempting such things as you with the help of others should bring about, you doubt not but things would do well. We are content, and do authorize you, if you shall see it necessary for their defence, to let them (as of your own adventure, and without justification that you have any direction therein from us) have the number of three hundred soldiers, when you shall expressly advertise that you send them that aid only for their defence, and not therewith to make war against the queen, wherein you shall so precisely deal with them that they may perceive your cause to be such, as if it should otherwise appear, your danger should be so great as all the friends you have could not be able to save you towards us. And so, we assure you, our conscience moveth us to charge you so to proceed with them, for otherwise than to preserve them from ruin we do not yield to give them aid of money or men; and yet we would not that either of these were known to be our act, but rather to be covered with your own desire and attempt." Elizabeth, however, soon discovered that her ambassador had as greatly overrated the strength of the insurgents, as he had underrated the power and popularity of the queen, and the orders to Bedford were therefore countermanded, and the promised succours, for which Moray and his associates so eagerly looked, never arrived. †

Finding themselves disappointed in their expectations of being joined by the great body of the Protestant party in Scotland, as well as of assistance from the English court, the insurgent nobles wrote once more to Queen Mary, offering "to return to their allegiance provided she would restore to them their forfeited estates, replace them in the places and preferments they formerly enjoyed, and that she should remove all foreigners from her service, and refrain from the use of the mass." As Mary treated their offer with contempt, they published a proclamation declaring that "their motives in taking up arms were for the security of their religion, the glory of God, and to prevent infractions on the laws and liberties of the realm by two or three tyrants who had the sole guidance of the queen." They also made another and more urgent, but still fruitless, appeal to Elizabeth for assistance, and instructed their agent, Robert Melvil, to assure the English queen that Mary and her counsellors were pressing the other subversion of the Church of Christ within the realm, and the re-establishment of Popery and superstition. They described the grievous dilapidation of the patrimony of the crown, which, they affirmed, had led to the persecution of honourable men, and complained of the promotion of Riccio and other foreigners to the place in council, which properly belonged to the ancient nobility. Darnley, a stranger and the subject of another realm, had intruded himself, they alleged, into the state, and claimed the name and authority of a king, against all order that ever was used in the realm; while they, because they desired the redress of these abuses, were persecuted as traitors and enemies to the commonwealth. "The cause," said they, "why our destruction is sought is, first, the zeal we bear to the maintenance of the true religion; and, secondly, the care that we have to redress the past enormities lately crept into the public regimen of this miserable commonwealth."*

These apprehensions were certainly not without foundation. The appointment of Riccio to the important and confidential office of secretary to the queen was matter of public notoriety, and had given great offence to the haughty nobility of Scotland. Mary had at this juncture entered into a correspondence with Philip II. of Spain, expressing her desire to commit herself, her husband, and her realm to his protection. In an autograph letter to this monarch, she declares her own and her husband's devoted attachment to the Roman Catholic religion, and expresses her conviction that it is the intention of her Protestant subjects to deprive them of their crown, unless they obtained the support of France or Spain. "The struggle," she says, "is not merely for the crown, but for the liberty of the Church, which otherwise will be crushed for ever."† Philip not only expressed his determination to assist the Scottish queen to subdue the Protestant rebels, to maintain the ancient faith, and to vindicate her rights to the English throne; but, as an earnest of the aid which he was prepared to afford, he placed twenty thousand crowns in the hands of his ambassador at the court of England, with orders to employ it "with the utmost secrecy and address in support of the Scottish queen and her husband."‡ Mary had also solicited pecuniary assistance from the Pope, who sent her a remittance of eight thousand crowns in a vessel which was wrecked on the English coast, near Bamborough; and the Earl of Northumberland, though a Roman Catholic and a friend of Mary, seized the money, which he positively refused to give up.§

Before proceeding to the Borders in pursuit of the insurgents, Mary deemed it prudent to pro-

Andrew's, and took possession on the way of Castle Campbell, a stronghold of the Earl of Argyle. At St. Andrew's she obliged some of the barons, whose fidelity she suspected, to subscribe a bond for her defence; and issued a proclamation against the rebels, declaring that they used religion only as a cloak to cover their wicked designs, and that the Earl of Moray was actuated by an insatiable ambition, which was not to be satisfied with riches and honours however great, unless he should also continue to have, as he had too long had, the queen and the whole realm in his own hands, to be used and governed at his pleasure. "By letter sent from themselves to us," she continued, "they make plain profession that the establishment of religion will not content them, but we must perforce be governed by such council as it shall please them to appoint unto us." "The like," she adds, "was never demanded of any of our most noble progenitors heretofore, yea, not even of governors or regents, but the prince, or such as occupied his place, ever chose his council of such as he thought most fit for the purpose. When we ourselves were of less age, and at our first arrival in our realm, we had free choice of our council at our pleasure; and now, when we are at our full majority, shall we be brought back to the state of pupils and minors, or be put under tutelage? So long as some of them bore the whole swing with us themselves, this matter was never called in question, but now, when they cannot be longer permitted to do and undo all things of their appetite, they will put a bridle in our mouths, and give us a council chosen after their phantasy! To speak it in plain language, they would be king themselves; or, at the least, leaving to us the bare name and title, take to themselves the whole use and administration of the kingdom."*

From St. Andrew's Mary proceeded to Dundee, on which she imposed a fine of two thousand marks, on the plea that the magistrates of that town had secretly favoured the insurgents, and allowed some men to be levied there for their service. After a brief visit to Perth and Dunfermline, she returned to Edinburgh on the 19th of September, having everywhere received a cordial welcome from her subjects. Elizabeth, meanwhile, with many fair professions of regard and friendship for Mary, had professed her good offices to effect a

De Foix, the French ambassador, to whom Elizabeth expressed herself in very angry terms at this rejection of her friendly offices, having endeavoured to mediate between the two queens, was requested by Elizabeth to hear from Cecil a statement of the causes of complaint which the insurgents had against their sovereign. That crafty statesman professed his inability to say who was most to blame in the quarrel, but stated that "he had been told that it all proceeded from the marriage of the Queen of Scotland with the son of the Earl of Lennox, previously to which she and her subjects had lived in the greatest harmony, owing to the good administration and faithful services of those whom she at present pursued. All that Moray and his friends required," he added, was, "that the queen should replace them in the same state of peace and repose they had enjoyed previous to her marriage, and that she should remove all causes of complaint which had been given by innovations against their laws, liberties, and the privileges of the nobles." De Foix inquired what innovations had been made by the Scottish queen; Cecil replied, that "according to the laws of the realm, the Duke of Chatelherault and the Earl of Argyle were hereditary councillors of the crown of Scotland, and that they had been driven away. Moreover, that the husband of the Queen of Scotland, against the laws of the realm, and to the prejudice of the nearest in blood, had been proclaimed king. Yet her first husband, King Francis, being Dauphin of France, never assumed the title of King of Scotland till it had been conferred upon him by the general consent of the Estates of that realm—a prince very great in comparison of the son of the Earl of Lennox, who was of no account." Cecil also alleged that Darnley was accused of having wished "to slay the Earl of Moray, and having treated him at all times with threats and various kinds of insults," and that the malcontents complained of the great consideration with which Mary treated her two Italian servants, David Riccio and Francisco.†

Mary's indignation at the proceedings of the insurgents was now so great, that she would listen to no intercession on their behalf. "She is now so offended," says Randolph, "that she cannot abide any man that wisheth concord between her and them." At this moment, Monsieur de Mauvisière, the Sieur de Castelnau, arrived in Scotland, having been appointed by the French king to carry his congratulations to Mary and Darnley on their marriage, with instructions to attempt a reconciliation between Mary and Elizabeth. On passing through England, however, Mauvisière was induced by Elizabeth and the French ambassador there to include the insurgent nobles in his specific mission, and with that view obtained letters from his master addressed to them. Mary, however, expressed great dissatisfaction when this was made known to her. She declared to the French envoy that nothing had been done on her part to provoke the revolt; that she had made no alteration in the established religion; and, in regard to the marriage, the insurgent lords had agreed to it in the first instance, and then endeavoured to prevent it, wishing to be kings themselves instead of subjects. They were devoid of faith, she alleged, to their native sovereign, having applied for aid to the Queen of England, and offered to become tributaries to her, instead of performing their real duty to their queen and country. She would not allow subjects like those to give laws to her, and convert her realm, which from ancient time had been a monarchy, into a republic. She would prefer death to seeing it come to that. With tears in her eyes, she declared that her whole reliance was on France, which would lose something if she were crushed, seeing that the kings of France had often had good service from the Scots. But if she were abandoned by her royal brother and mother-in-law, she would be compelled to seek aid from another prince. She then entreated Mauvisière to keep back the letters which he carried to the insurgent lords, and not to tell a living creature that he had been instructed to negotiate between them and her. "I would rather lose an arm," she passionately exclaimed, "than they should receive those letters which the King of France has written to them."* Mauvisière informed her, that the King of France and the Queen-mother earnestly advised her to make some concessions to induce her nobles to live in peace with her; but he at length yielded to her importunity, and agreed not to deliver the letters which his master had written to the insurgents.

Mary was at this time reduced to great pecuniary straits in maintaining the Mary's primary forces which she had collected to take the field against the malcontents. She had already been compelled to pledge part of her jewels for two thousand marks—a sum totally inadequate to her necessities—and now sought to revivify her exhausted finances by borrowing some of money from the merchants of Edinburgh. Having discovered that several of them who had excused themselves from contributing to this loan, under the pretext of poverty, had been recently affording pecuniary aid to the insurgents, she summoned seventeen of the offenders to appear before the Privy Council, and amerced them in a thousand marks; and those who had met the rebel lords at Dumfries had to pay an equal sum. A loan of ten thousand marks was granted by the Corporation of Edinburgh, on condition of their receiving from the queen the mortgage of the superiority of Leith. Having thus raised the necessary funds for the expedition, Mary quitted the capital on the 8th of October, to march southwards against the insurgents, who still lay with a small force at Dumfries.

On her approach, at the head of an army amounting to no less than eighteen thousand men, Moray and his associates, unable to make head against this greatly superior force, retreated across the Border, and took refuge in Carlisle. Maxwell of Terregles, a powerful Border baron who had recently joined the insurgents, and raised a troop of horse for their service with a thousand pounds of English money which he had received for that purpose, hastened to make his submission; and Mary, after granting him a pardon, and visiting his castle of Loehmaben, where he entertained her and her consort for three days, returned to Edinburgh on the 18th October, and disbanded her army, leaving Bothwell with some troops to watch the Borders.*

Meanwhile, the fugitive nobles, being hospitably entertained by the Earl of Bedford, fixed their residence at Newcastle, whence Moray and the Abbot of Kilwinning were deputed to proceed to the English court, and lay their claims before the queen. The failure of their enterprise, however, had satisfied Elizabeth that she had been misled by her agents in Scotland, and that the influence of the malcontents had been greatly overrated. She had, moreover, lately received a spirited remonstrance from Mary, on account of the policy she had followed in sowing discord and jealousies among her subjects. "Your ministers," she said, "on the Borders, are threatening to put to fire and sack those subjects who met, according to their duty, to assist us against our rebels, instead of according the aid I had hoped from you, and which I protest before God I would have given to you had you been in like circumstances. Nevertheless, I cannot persuade myself that you, being so nearly related to me, would show so little regard to my cause as to place on an equality with me men in whom I am assured you will find, in the end, no more faith than I have done. If I be deceived in my opinion of your natural affection, I would at the least appeal, as behoves a good sister, to the duty which all Christian princes owe each other, lest you should find others take example from your conduct to do the like. And if you are pleased, which I cannot believe, to make common cause with my traitors, I shall regret to be compelled not to conceal from all the princes our allies this great wrong, which we are willing to impute to the fault of your officers, unless we have plain declaration that it is so."*

no measured terms of fomenting, by her intrigues, the commotions in Scotland, she abandoned to their fate without hesitation the men who had hazarded their lives and fortunes, in dependence on her promises, and treated them with open and studied insult and scorn. As soon as she heard that Moray was on his way to her court, she sent a messenger to stop him, and to inform him that it was not meet for him to have any "open dealing" with her. The earl remained at Ware, till, at the earnest entreaty of Bedford, a secret messenger was sent to him, permitting him to continue his journey. A considerable time elapsed, however, before he could obtain an audience of the queen, and this favour was only granted him at length through the intercession of the French ambassador. When he was admitted into the presence of Elizabeth, with her characteristic dissimulation, and more than her usual effrontery, she demanded "how he, a rebel to her sister of Scotland, durst take the boldness upon him to come into her realm?" "These

Her base treatment of Moray. and the like words got he," says Knox, "instead of the good and courteous entertainment he expected." Moray, in reply, referred to the promises of support they had all along received from her in their enterprise. "Madam," said he, "whatsoever thing your majesty meant in your heart we are thereof ignorant, but thus much we know assuredly, that we had lately promises of aid and support by your ambassador and familiar servants in your name; and, further, we have your own handwriting confirming the said promises."† This defence so exasperated Elizabeth, that she declared the earl and his friend should receive nothing from her but neglect and scorn, until he publicly retracted the assertion which he had made. With this demand Moray and his companion, the Abbot of Kilwinning, had the meanness and dishonesty to comply. In the presence of the French and Spanish ambassadors they affirmed, upon their knees, according to preconcerted arrangement, that the Queen of England had never moved them to any opposition or resistance against their own sovereign. "Now," exclaimed Elizabeth, "ye have told the truth; for neither did I, nor any in my name, stir ye up against your queen; for your abominable treason might serve for example to move my own subjects to rebel against me. Therefore, get ye out of my presence—ye are but unworthy traitors."‡

buke which she thus administered to her rebellious subjects. "I could have wished," she wrote, "that your ears had been judges, to hear both the honour and affection which I manifested towards you, to the complete disproof of what is stated, that I defended your rebel subjects against you, which will be always very far removed from my heart, it being too great an ignominy for a princess, I will not say to do, but even to suffer."* The history of these transactions is thus briefly and quaintly summed up by Sir James Melvil:—"Mary chasit the rebel lords here and there, till at length they were compelled to flee into England for refuge to her that had promised by her ambassadors to wair (expend) her crown in their defence, in case they were driven to any strait for their opposition to the said marriage." "But Elizabeth," he adds, "handlit the matter sae subtilly, and the other twa sae blaitly (timidly), that she triumphed both over them and the ambassadors." The earl and his friend returned in deep dejection to their associates at Newcastle, where they lived for some time in great distress.

Mary had waited with anxiety to see what reception her malcontent nobles would meet with at the English court; and, whatever credit she might attach to the deceitful professions of her royal cousin, she heard with great satisfaction the welcome news of the severe treatment which Moray had received. The intelligence was communicated to her by the French ambassador, and was immediately published to her court. An express was forwarded to Darnley, who at the time was absent on a hawking expedition; and letters announcing the gratifying fact were ordered to be written, and dispatched to all parts of Scotland. The party of Mary and her husband were greatly elated by the news, while "all the contrary faction," says Randolph, "are discouraged, and think themselves utterly undone."

At this juncture the Duke of Chatelherault, The Hamiltons greatly to the dissatisfaction of Lennox and Darnley, succeeded in making his peace with Mary; and, on his humble submission, was pardoned, on condition of his surrendering his castles of Hamilton and Draphane into the hands of the queen, and living abroad for five years. But measures were taken to put the Elizabeth to Queen Mary, 29th Oct., 1565. Labanoff's Appendix, vol. vii. Randolph, who was a fitting agent for his unscrupulous sovereign, stoutly supported her false averment; but "Sir Nicolas Throckmorton, who was a man of integrity, stood neither in awe of queen nor council, but freely owned that he had made promises to the Scottish lords in name of his mistress; for which plainness it was thought he might have suffered largely, had he not wisely obtained an Act of Secret Council for his warrant when he came into Scotland and made these promises, and which Act he boldly, at that time, offered to produce."—Kelch, vol. ii. p. 378. "The said Sir Nicolas," says Sir James Melvil, "was so angry that he had been made an instrument to deceive the Scots banished lords, that he advised them to sue humbly for pardon at their own queen's hand, and to engage never again to offend her for satisfaction of any prince alive; and because, as they then stated, they had no interest, he penned a persuasive letter, and sent unto her majesty."—Melvil's Memoirs, p. 141.

law into execution against the rest of the insurgent nobles, and to strip them of their titles and estates. The parliament was summoned to meet in February, and it was publicly announced that Moray and his associates would then be brought to trial, and sentence of forfeiture passed against them. To avert the utter ruin thus impending, Moray earnestly solicited the services of all who had any influence at the English court; he interceded with Elizabeth—wrote to Cecil, imploring him to save him from being "wrecked for ever"—addressed a letter to Queen Elizabeth—and even condemned to send a letter to Ricciò, accompanied by the present of a rich diamond, soliciting his assistance.* The friends of the exiled nobles also interceded, and exerted themselves to the utmost behalf of Moray, to procure their pardon. Sir James Melvil represented to Mary, that "since the Queen of England had dealt so uncourteously with that gentleman before the ambassadors, and broken all her fine promises to him and the other associate lords, that she should take that opportunity of humiliating him, and proving how much better her service was than that of the English sovereign." † He also strongly urged the impolicy of driving the insurgents to despair, and warned both the queen and her favourite counsellor, Ricciò, of the danger of proceeding to extremities against men who had been among the most powerful subjects in the kingdom, and who had still many influential adherents. The remonstrances of this prudent and trusty servant of the crown were warmly supported by Sir Nicolas Throckmorton, who recommended the pardoning of the exiled nobles as a measure to be less prudent than popular. An action of this nature, he said, the pure effect of her majesty's generosity, would spread the fame of her lenity and moderation, and engage the English, and especially the Protestant portion of them, to look forward to Mary's accession to the throne of England not only without prejudice, but with desire. By the same means, a perfect harmony would be restored among her subjects, who, if any rupture should happen with England, would serve her with that grateful zeal which the clemency of their sovereign could not fail to inspire. ‡

This moderate and judicious advice made a deep impression on Mary, "as well," observes Melvil, "for the good opinion of him that sent it, as being of her own nature more inclined to easy than to rigour, together that she was wise and possessed a zeal thereby unto the advancement of her affairs in England. She took a resolution to follow the advice, and to postpone the parliament that was set to forfealt the lords that were fled." §

Unfortunately for the welfare of Mary and the prosperity of the country, at this critical moment two envoys, De Rambouillet and Couran, arrived in Scotland on a special mission from the French court.

and threw the whole weight of their influence into the opposite scale. The former was instructed to congratulate the queen on her marriage, and to invest her consort with the order of St. Michael; but the latter, who was specially accredited by the Cardinal Lorraine to confer with Mary on matters of religion, along with Thornton, a messenger from Beaton, the Scottish ambassador in France, who came to court about the same time, informed the queen of the confederacy which, at the instigation of the infamous Catherine de Medici and the Duke of Alva, had recently been formed between France, Spain, and the emperor, for the extirpation of the Protestant faith throughout Europe.* A copy of the "band" or league, for this purpose, which had been drawn up at Bayonne in the summer of the preceding year, was brought by Thornton from the Cardinal Lorraine, and Mary was strongly urged to join the coalition, and to avail herself of the present favourable opportunity to crush the leaders of the Protestant party in Scotland. It was represented to her that the measures which she contemplated for the advancement of the Romish faith would never be sanctioned by the Estates of the realm, if Moray and his friends were allowed to return, and resume their places in parliament; and that if she neglected the present opportunity of destroying the heretical faction which had so long troubled the kingdom and thwarted her authority, her misfortunes were only in their commencement. Riccio, who, according to Sir James Melvil, seemed at first inclined to recommend a more lenient policy, now supported with all his influence the views of the French ambassadors, which were also enforced with the utmost earnestness by the king and the whole of the Romish party. Mary unfortunately yielded to their advice, and signed the league for the extirpation of the Protestants;† and, in pursuance of the policy to which she thus became pledged, she resolved to take immediate steps for the forfeiture of the banished lords. At the time when she was inclined to yield to the intercession made in their behalf, she adjourned the parliament to the 7th of April, but, by a new proclamation, the 7th of March was now fixed for its meeting, and Moray and his associates were summoned to appear on the 12th, to answer for their treason.

As soon as Mary's adhesion to the Roman Catholic League, and her resolution to hasten the meeting of parliament for the forfeiture of the exiled lords, became known, they saw at once that their only hope of escape from ruin lay in the adoption of prompt and desperate measures; and a coalition was formed between them and the various parties who were dissatisfied with the queen's policy, for the purpose of preventing the meeting of parliament, and overturning the government. Strange to say, the queen's youthful consort was among the most prominent of these malcontents. Darnley's personal graces and accomplishments were unhappily not accompanied by those Darnley's vicious moral and intellectual qualifications indispensable for the position to which he had been elevated. He was weak, inexperienced, and headstrong; ambitious of power, yet totally unfit to wield it. The grievous defects of his character became every day more painfully apparent, and his behaviour more discreditable. He broke out into a thousand excesses, indulged in gross licentiousness and intemperance, and not only neglected the queen and forsook her company, but even publicly treated her with disrespect and brutal insult. The following account of the manner in which this foolish and profligate youth resented an attempt on the part of the queen, to restrain him from disgracing himself by a public exposure of his dissolute habits, is communicated to Cecil by Sir William Drury, in a letter from Berwick:—"Monsieur de la Roe Paussey and his brother arrived here yesterday (from Scotland). He is sick, my Lord Darnley having made him drunk of aqua composita.* All people say that Darnley is too much addicted to drinking. It is certainly reported there was some jar betwixt the queen and him at an entertainment in a merchant's house in Edinburgh—she only dissuading him from drinking too much himself, and entreating others—in both which he proceeded, and gave her such words, that she left the place with tears; which they who know their proceedings say are not strange to be seen. * * * His government is very much blamed, for he is thought to be wilful and haughty, and some say vicious; whereof too many were witnesses the other day at Inchkeith, with the Lord Robert, Fleming, and such like grave personages.† I will not rehearse to your honour what of certainty is said of him at his being there."‡

At the time of their marriage, Mary had lavished on her unworthy consort all the tokens of the most devoted affection.§ She had illegally, as well as unwisely, caused him to be proclaimed king on her own authority, and without the consent of the Estates—a step taken in opposition to her own judgment, and which gave great offence to her nobles—his name in all public writs was signed, in some before, in others after her own,|| and the public coin of the realm issued subsequent to the marriage also contained his name. All this, however, did not content the ambitious, yet incapable, youth whom Mary had so unfortunately associated with herself in the sovereignty of Scotland, and he imperiously demanded the crown matrimonial—"a term," says Mr. Bell, "used only by Scottish historians, by many of whom its exact import does not appear to have been understood. In its more limited acceptation, it seems to have conferred upon the husband who married a wife of superior rank, the whole of her power and dignity so long as their union continued. Thus, if a countess married an esquire, he might become by the marriage contract a matrimonial earl, and during the life of the countess her authority was vested in her husband as entirely as if he had been an earl by birth. But it was in a more extended sense that Darnley was anxious for this matrimonial dignity. Knowing it to be consistent with the laws of Scotland that a person who married an heiress should keep possession of her estate, not only during his wife's life, but till his own death, he was desirous of having a sovereign sway secured in his own person, even though Mary died without issue."*

In the first ardour of her affection for Darnley, Mary appears to have promised him this share in the government; but, after his real character became known to her, she naturally hesitated to place supreme authority in the hands of one who had shown himself so unfit to exercise it.† The more reluctant the queen showed herself to gratify his ambition, the more vehement he became in his demands that the promised dignity should be conferred upon him; and though she urged that this gift was beyond her power, and could be conferred only by the authority of parliament, his headstrong temper led him to persist in his request. Riccio had hitherto been the friend of Darnley, and, by the cordial support which he had given to his marriage with the queen, had incurred the hatred of Moray and the Protestant nobles. It would appear, however, that the weakness and vacillation of the king had lost him the confidence of the astute foreigner, and that he now refused to support his pretensions to the crown matrimonial. Darnley, therefore, not only became estranged from the queen, and treated her with the utmost coldness and harshness, but contracted a bitter dislike to her favourite secretary, whom he regarded as the author of those measures which withheld from him what he considered his due share of the government, for which it was too obvious, he was utterly incompetent, both by his disposition and habits. To witness the breach between Mary and her husband, he had even the folly to believe and affirm that Riccio had supplanted him in the affections of the queen, and that the confidence with which she treated her foreign secretary betokened the existence between them of a criminal familiarity.* Infuriated by jealousy and disappointment, Darnley communicated his suspicions to his uncle, George Douglas, commonly called the Postulate, an illegitimate son of the late Earl of Angus, and sent him to entreat Lord Ruthven, who was married to the king's aunt, to assist him against "the villain Riccio." Ruthven had for some months been confined to bed by a dangerous illness, and was at this time, as he himself states, "scarcely able to walk twice the length of his chamber."† Yet he at once consented to engage in the villainous scheme for the assassination of Riccio. From an early period, the conspirators seem to have concerted the intended murder of the secretary with a project to seize the person of the queen, and to usurp the government; for, on the 13th of February, Randolph wrote to Leicester, informing him that Darnley and his father were determined to put Riccio to death, and to deprive the queen of her crown; and that designs still more atrocious were meditated against her, which he could not venture to commit to writing. "I know now for certain," said he, "that the queen regretteth her marriage; that she hateth him [Darnley] and all his kin. I know that he knoweth himself that he hath a partaker in play and game with him; I know that there are practices in hand, contrived between father and son, to come by the crown against her will; I know that if that take effect which is intended, David, with the consent of the king, shall have his throat cut within these ten days. Many things grievous, and more than these, are brought to my ears—yea, of things intended

The vile and profligate example, which is countenanced by no other prince of the world, and is utterly unworthy of credit. We are commonly informed by all the contemporary writers who speak of Riccio, that he was advanced in years, and decrepit, that he was on account of any beauty he possessed, being an old man, and ugly, warthy, and ill-favoured; but many other great qualities, fidelity, wisdom, prudence, and many other excellent qualities." Connoisseur declares that he was "of a most pure blood, but of spotted faith, and possessed of rare talents." Lamb, Gurvey, Counsellor and Treasurer to the King of France, says—"I was well acquainted with David Riccio, and whom I received many favours in that court. He was of years, of dark hue, and very ill-favoured, but of a most pure blood, and very skilled in business." and further says, "of the deformity of his body." against her own person—which, because I think better to keep secret than write to Mr. Secretary, I speak not of them, but now to your lordship.”*

This statement of Randolph respecting the plot of Darnley and Lennox against the queen, is corroborated by an interesting document in the collection of Prince Labanoff, copied from the archives of the house of Medici, in which it is distinctly stated that Darnley had given his consent to the death of the queen, as well as to the murder of Riccio. It is even affirmed by Blackwood in his “Martyre de Marie,” that it was not the original intention of the conspirators to assassinate Riccio, but merely to secure the person of Mary, and that it was in consequence of Riccio’s fidelity to the queen, and his refusal to sanction such a proceeding, that they afterwards changed their plan. The king, he says, “hated Riccio greatly, both because he had laboured to effect the re-establishment of the house of Hamilton, and because he had not only refused to become a party to, but had even revealed to the queen, a certain conspiracy that had been concluded on between his highness and the rebels, by which it was resolved to shut up her majesty in a castle under good and secure guard, that Darnley might gain for himself all authority, and the entire government of the kingdom. My Lord Ruthven, the head of this conspiracy, entertained the greatest ill-will against the poor secretary, because he had neither dared nor been able to conceal from her majesty that he had found Ruthven and all the conspirators assembled together in council in a small closet, and had heard her husband express himself with especial violence and chagrin. Besides, Morton, fearing greatly the foresight and penetration of this man, whom he knew to be entirely opposed to his designs, resolved to accomplish his death, and in so doing comply with the advice which had been given him by the English court.”† The assertion, however, that the existence and object of this conspiracy were known both to Riccio and the queen, is not supported by any trustworthy evidence, and is at variance with the whole of their conduct towards the conspirators.

Ruthven communicated to the Earl of Morton, then chancellor of the kingdom, Darnley’s desire to be revenged upon Riccio, and this able but unscrupulous nobleman perceived at once the facilities which this plot would afford him to promote his own selfish schemes, as well as to labour for the restoration of the banished lords. He had reason to apprehend that in the approaching parliament he would be compelled to restore certain crownlands which had been illegally appropriated, and would also be deprived of his office as chancellor, and therefore, with the view of averting these personal calamities, as well as the forfeiture of his friends, he entered heartily into the conspiracy. In order to secure more certainly the success of their nefarious project, Morton proceeded to widen the basis of the plot, and to procure the co-operation of Moray and his associates, and the countenance of the English queen and her ministers, Cecil and Leicester. The concurrence of some of the leading Protestant barons appears to have been obtained without difficulty. They entertained at this moment great apprehensions respecting the dangers which threatened the cause of the Reformation, and it cannot be denied that their fears were well founded. It was known that the queen had joined the Roman Catholic confederacy for the extermination of the Protestants, and her letters to the Pope, the King of Spain, and her uncles, the cardinals of Lorraine and Guise, show that she fondly cherished the hope of restoring the Papal hierarchy, not only in Scotland, but in England also. Every effort had been made for some time past to induce the leading nobles to accompany the queen and Darnley to mass.* It was suspected that a parliamentary investigation was about to be made into the right of the lay abbots, priors, commendators, and bishops, to retain the ecclesiastical domains which they had unjustly appropriated. The popish ecclesiastics were restored to their seats in parliament—an important step in the queen’s estimation towards the restoration of the ancient religion.† Her consort had been heard to declare that, “he would have a mass again in St. Giles’s Church ere long;” and it is said that the altars which were to be erected in that church for the celebration of the Roman Catholic worship were already prepared. The whole procedure, in short, of the queen and her councillors made it evident that a strenuous effort was about to be made for the re-establishment of the “auld religion” in Scotland, and that measures for that purpose were in preparation, and only waited for the meeting of parliament to be carried into execution. In these circumstances, Lords Lindsay, Ochiltree, and other reforming nobles, were induced, for the purpose of averting these impending dangers, to join in a plot to prevent the meeting of parliament, by putting Riccio to death, restoring the banished lords, imprisoning the queen, and conferring the supreme power upon Darnley.‡ Riccio was pecu-

* Randolph states that the king “sent for the Lords Fleming, Livingston, and Lindsay, and asked them whether they would be content to go to mass with him, which they refusing, he gave them all very evil words. The queen useth speech to some others she used to take by the hand and offered to lead them with her to mass, which thing the Earls of Bothwell and Huntley both refused to do. The Lord Darnley sometime would shut up the noblemen in chambers, thereby to bring them to hear mass.”—Randolph to Throckmorton, Feb. 7th, and to Cecil, Feb. 8th, 1565-6.

‡ A charge has recently been brought by Mr. Tytler against John Knox of being privy to this conspiracy, founded entirely on a scrap of paper which that writer found pinned (by some person unknown) to a document in the State Paper Office, in which paper is a list (written by some person unknown) containing the names of Knox and liarily obnoxious to all the parties engaged in this atrocious conspiracy. He was detested by Darnley

General dislike as the person who had advised the queen to withhold from him the crown matrimonial, and who had, as he imagined, even dishonoured his bed. He was regarded by the Reformers as the pensioned agent of the Pope, the tool of the unscrupulous Cardinal of Lorraine, the enemy of the Protestant faith, and the bigoted supporter of the Romish Church; while the banished lords believed that he was the principal adviser of the queen in the measures which she was about to propose to parliament for their forfeiture. The unfortunate secretary had indeed incurred the envy and hatred of almost every one about the court. The Scots have always manifested great aversion to allow strangers to interfere with their affairs; and Riccio, in consequence both of his foreign extraction and of his low birth, was doubly obnoxious to the ignorant and haughty Scottish barons. In the homely, but expressive language of Melvil, "some of the nobility would gloom upon him, and some of them would shoulder him and shoot him by, when they entered in the chamber and found him always speaking with her majesty." His religion too added to his general unpopularity; and he is moreover accused, both by Melvil and Knox, of interfering with the administration of justice in the Court of Session, and of receiving bribes from the nobles to further their suits with the queen. Riccio, as we have seen, was aware of the dislike with which he was regarded by the courtiers, and received in good part the judicious advice which Sir James Melvil gave him, to be cautious how he intermeddled openly with public affairs, to give place to the nobility, and to avoid any open manifestation of familiarity with the queen. But he alleged, that though anxious to adopt this prudent course, he was prevented by the queen, who "would not suffer him, but would needs have him to use himself in the old manner." Melvil advised the queen herself, but without effect, to be cautious as to the favour she evinced to one who was suspected to be a pensioner of the Pope, and to "alter her carriage" to him, reminding her of the unfortunate affair of Chatelard, her affability with whom had done her serious injury. Mary, however, entertained opinions very different from those his colleague, Craig, among the conspirators who had fled. The incorrectness of this unsubscribed and suspicious paper has been shown from its containing the name of Craig, who was never suspected of the plot, and never left the city. It is disproved by an authenticated list of the conspirators, in which no mention is made either of Knox or Craig, and by the official lists of the proscribed individuals, published after the whole plot had been revealed by the king to Mary, who would gladly have availed herself of the slightest pretext to have involved John Knox in the odium and guilt of the conspiracy. And it is distinctly contradicted by the conspirators themselves, who declare that the ministers had no share whatever in aiding or abetting the transaction. Great stress has been laid upon the fact that a fast happened to be held in Edinburgh at the time of Riccio's death, but the truth is that this fast was appointed in December of the preceding year, when no such event was contemplated. For a further consideration of this question, see Appendix, Note XXI.

of her nobles respecting the privileges of hereditary rank and the claims of real merit. In a fragment on the duties of a sovereign, which has been preserved among her private papers, she inquires, "what ought a monarch to do if his ancestors have ennobled a man of worth whose offspring has become degenerate? Must it be that the monarch is compelled to hold in like esteem with the wise and valiant father, the son who is unscrupulous, selfish, and a violator of the laws? If, on the other hand, the monarch find a man of low degree, poor in this world's goods, but of a generous spirit and faithful heart, and fitted for the service he requires, may not he venture to put such a one in authority, because the nobles, having formerly monopolised all offices, desire to do so still?" Acting on these enlightened opinions, which were far in advance of her age and country, Mary did not regard the "low birth and indigent condition" of the Italian as sufficient barriers to exclude him from honourable office; and, disgusted at the treachery of her nobles, among whom it would be difficult, at this time, to find one honest and trustworthy person, she now, in all affairs of secrecy and importance, chiefly consulted her foreign secretary, who was recommended to her by his polite and obsequious manners, and his talent for business, as well as by his fidelity. The step was every way an imprudent one, and was followed by the most disastrous consequences. The favour which she showed towards Riccio excited the jealousy of her husband, and the envy of her court; while it appears to have turned the head of the hapless foreigner himself, who foolishly began to imitate, and even outvie the nobility in the splendour of his dress and equipage. Melvil said, at an early period, warned both his royal mistress and her unpopular secretary of the danger which they incurred by proceeding to extremities against the exiled barons, and hinted that he had heard "wide speeches of strange things that might befall ere the parliament she was about to convene ended," but without effect. The queen exclaimed with a burst of indignation, "I defy them! What should they do, and what dare they do?" "While David," says Melvil, "disdained all danger and despised counsel, so that I was compelled to say, 'I feared late repentance.'"† At a later period, after the plot against him was manifested, Riccio received a significant warning from one Damiot, a professed astrologer, whom Calderwood designates a "French priest and a sorcerer." This young man warned Riccio to beware of the bastard, alluding to George Douglas, the illegitimate son of the Earl of Angus; but the foolishly credulous secretary, supposing that Moray was the person referred to, denied the warning, and replied, "I will take good care he never sets foot again in Scotland." Another of his friends told him of his unpopularity, and advised him speedily to settle his affairs and to return to his own country with the property he had amassed—about eleven thousand pounds Scots, rather more than two thousand pounds sterling; but so little did Riccio know the character of the people he was assisting the queen to govern, that he replied he was not afraid of them—they were mere ducks—strike one of them and all the rest would cower down. “You will find them geese,” was the answer; “if you handle one of them, the rest will fly upon you and pluck you so that they will leave neither feather nor down upon you.”*

Morton having so far matured the plot for the overthrow of the government and the destruction of Riccio, proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the execution of his atrocious scheme. According to the usual practice of this age, a formal “band” or “covenant” was drawn up, and signed by the conspirators, setting forth the objects which they had in view, and providing for their mutual co-operation and security. This agreement was expressed in the king’s name, though it was signed also by Morton and Ruthven, and probably by some others, and its contents were communicated to Maitland of Lethington, as well as to Moray and the other banished lords. It contained denunciations of certain wicked and ungodly persons—especially an Italian called David—by whom the queen’s “good and gentle nature” was abused; and declared the resolution of the king, with the assistance of his friends, to seize these enemies, and, if resistance was offered, “to cut them off immediately, and slay them, wherever it happened;” while Darnley solemnly promised, on the word of a prince, that he would maintain and defend his associates in this deed, even though it should be perpetrated within the precincts of the palace, and in the presence of the queen.† It was now judged expedient to inform Moray and his associates of the plot, and for this purpose the king’s father, the Earl of Lennox, was dispatched to England. The exiled barons appear to have readily embarked on an enterprise which promised to avert their impending ruin, and to restore them to their former position at the head of affairs. A second “covenant” was therefore drawn up, supplementary to the first, between Henry King of Scotland, and James Earl of Moray, Archibald Earl of Argyle, Andrew Earl of Rothes, Robert Lord Boyd, Andrew Lord Ochiltree, and certain others “remaining in England,” in which it was stipulated, on the part of the lords, that, at the first parliament which should be held after their return, they would procure for Darnley the crown matrimonial of Scotland; and that, in the event of the queen’s death, he should be declared her rightful successor, and his father the next heir after himself; and that they would “seek, pursue, and extirpate out of the realm of Scotland, or take and slay,” all who opposed this resolution;

while Darnley, on his part, engaged that he should not allow, in as much as in him lay, any forfeiture to be laid against them; and that, as soon as he obtained the crown matrimonial, he should give them a free remission for all crimes, taking every means to remove and punish any one who opposed such remission.*

It could scarcely be expected that a plot so widely ramified could escape the knowledge of the English queen and her agents in Scotland, and there is the clearest evidence that she was fully informed of the object of the conspiracy, and tacitly, at least, gave it her approval. Randolph was now at Berwick, having been expelled from Scotland in consequence of the discovery by the queen that he had encouraged and assisted Moray in his rebellion; † but he was evidently in close communication with the conspirators, and was fully informed respecting their proceedings. On the 6th of March he wrote to Elizabeth, to apprise her that “a matter of no small consequence was intended in Scotland,” referring her for particulars to a letter addressed by himself, in conjunction with the Earl of Bedford, to Secretary Cecil; adding, that the exiled barons would thus be restored, that Tuesday was the last day, and that they looked daily to hear of the execution of the plot.‡

The other letter from Bedford and Randolph to Cecil, entered much more minutely into a detail of the villanous project which was on foot, and enjoined the strictest secrecy, as they had promised that “no one except the queen, Leicester, and Cecil himself, should be informed of the great attempt now on the eve of being put in execution. “The matter,” they say, “is this:—Somewhat we are sure you have heard of divers discords and jarrers§ between this queen and her husband, partly for that she hath refused him the crown matrimonial, partly for that he hath assured knowledge of such usage of herself as altogether is intolerable to be borne, which, if it were not over well known, we would both be very loath to think that it could be true. To take away this occasion of slander, he is himself determined to be at the apprehension and execution of him whom he is able manifestly to charge with the crime, and to have done him the most dishonour that can be to any man, much more being as he is. We need not more plainly to describe the person; you have heard of the man whom we mean of.

which is the crown matrimonial, what is devised and concluded upon by him and the noblemen you shall see by the copies of the conditions between them and him, of which Mr. Randolph assureth me to have seen the principals, and taken the copies written with his own hand.

"The time of execution and performance of these matters is before the parliament, as near as it is. To this determination of theirs, there are privy in Scotland these:—Argyle, Morton, Boyd, Ruthven, and Liddington; in England these:—Moray, Rothes, Grange, myself, and the writer hereof. If persuasions to cause the queen to yield to these matters do no good, they purpose to proceed we know not in what sort. If she be able to make any power at home, she shall be withstood, and herself kept from all other counsel than her own nobility. If she seek any foreign support, the queen's majesty our sovereign shall be sought and sued unto to accept his and their defence, with offers reasonable to her majesty's contentment. These are the things which we thought, and think to be, of no small importance; and knowing them certainly intended and concluded upon, thought it our duties to utter the same to you, Mr. Secretary, to make declaration thereof as shall seem best to your wisdom; and of this matter thought to write conjunctly, though we came severally by knowledge, agreeing both in one in the substance of that which is determined."*

A sovereign actuated by a proper sense of honour, and possessed of ordinary integrity, or even of common humanity, would undoubtedly have warned the Scottish queen of her danger, and have thus enabled her to defeat the machinations of the conspirators against her government and her liberty. But, true to her cold-blooded and selfish policy, Elizabeth, in spite of her professions of warm attachment to Mary, carefully concealed from her the information which she had received, and not only allowed Moray to leave England, for the purpose of taking part in the plot which his friends had devised for his restoration, but, on his departure, loaded him with tokens of the highest confidence and distinction, and must, therefore, bear the infamy of an accomplice in those nefarious transactions which soon after followed.†

The plot, which had for some time been maturing, was now ripe for execution. There has been a great deal of controversy respecting the precise objects of the conspiracy which the conspirators had in view, and the lengths to which they were prepared to go for the accomplishment of their schemes. On the day preceding that appointed for the execution of the plot, Darnley challenged Riccio to play at tennis with him, probably for the purpose of lulling any suspicions which may have been entertained by his unhappy victim. While engaged in this game, which lasted for several hours, it was suggested to Darnley, aside, by some of his confederates, that it would be a convenient opportunity to set upon the secretary as he left the tennis-court, and dispatch him with their daggers; Darnley however refused, declaring that "he would have Riccio taken with the queen at supper, that he might be taunted in her presence." These have, therefore, insisted that the conspirators meant to take advantage of the situation in which Mary then was, and terrify her into a miscarriage, which might have ended in her death. And a recent biographer of the queen has even gone so far as to assert, that "the blow which was aimed at Mary was intended for her destruction and that of her unborn infant, and for the destruction of Darnley also, who, in the event of his consort's death, would have been torn limb from limb by the terrible justice of popular vengeance," or that Mary herself would "have assumed the character of the avenger of his royal sister, and trod his way over the mangled corpses of her guilty but deluded husband and his unprincipled father to the throne of Scotland." It is further affirmed by the same writer, that "the work of death was not to be confined to the foreign secretary; a wholesale scene of slaughter was contemplated, including the whole of Mary's ministers, who had shown themselves opposed to her virtual deposition by refusing to grant the crown matrimonial to her scornful husband. The intended victims were—the Earls of Bothwell, Huntley, and Atholl, the Lords Fleming and Livingstone, and Sir James Balfour; the last was, for some unexplained reason, to be hanged at the queen's chamber-door, and several of her most attached ladies were to be drowned. Mary herself, if she survived the horrors of the tragedy purposed to be acted in her presence, was either to be slain, or imprisoned in Stirling Castle, till she consented to legalise her husband's usurpation."‡ These foolish and absurd charges rest on no better foundation than the exaggerated surmises speculated at the time by unscrupulous partisans. The real object of the conspiracy was to secure the establishment of the Protestant religion against the plot which had been formed for its extirpation, and to prevent the forfeiture of the hereditary lords, and the resumption of the crown-lords and ecclesiastical benefices, which had been usurped by Morton and other nobles; and these ends they sought to gain by breaking off the meeting of parliament, recalling Moray and his associates, expelling the queen's Romish advisers, bestowing the crown matrimonial on Darnley, and putting Francis to death. With regard to the murder of the unfortunate secretary, there is good reason to believe that a portion at least of the conspirators intended only to bring him to public execution, and that their purpose was frustrated by the cool and blood-headed king, whose jealousy and hatred of Riccio hurried the matter to a premature issue. Even Ruthven, his principal confidant, announced him to the contrary, and thought it not decent that he should put hand on such a mean person ;” but the king persisting in his design, “Ruthven affixed a day on which David should be slain, though he would have him rather to be judged by the nobility.” That the great majority of the conspirators neither wished nor projected the tragical result, is evident from the language of Douglas of Lochleven, one of their number, who declares that it was their purpose “to have given him [Riceio] his trial, and punished him by order of justice. But men proposit and God disposit otherwise, by some extraordinary means, which truly my own heart abhorrit when I saw him; for I never consentit that he should be used by [beside or against] justice, neither was it in any nobleman his mind.”* And Hume of Godseroft, who may be almost termed a contemporary historian, and who possessed the best means of information, states that the noblemen had determined that Riceio should be carried to the city, and have his trial by assize, and so legally and formally (for they had matter enough against him) condemned and executed at the Market Cross of Edinburgh. On apprehending him, however, at the palace, which they were obliged to do by the king’s orders, their attendants, hearing the noise made by Huntley and Bothwell in the court below, and “not knowing what it might import, but fearing that he might be rescued from them, fell upon him, and stabbed him with their daggers, sore against the will and beside the intention of Morton and the rest of the noblemen, who thought to have caused execute him upon the scaffold, so to have gratified the common people, to whom it would have been a most acceptable and pleasant sight.”† From these statements, it appears plain that Darnley alone was bent upon the murder of Riceio; that some of the conspirators were willing to accede to his wishes, though they would have preferred a different course; while the others, either owing to circumstances or their known character, were not entrusted with the secret of the king’s bloody design, but were led to believe that the favourite was merely to be arrested and brought to trial.”‡

Mary had received some vague intimation that a conspiracy was in agitation against her,§ but she does not appear to have taken the alarm, or to have considered that she had any grounds for serious apprehension. She therefore proceeded to carry out her measures for the forfeiture of the banished lords, and the restoration of the Roman Catholic religion. The parliament assembled on Thursday, the 7th of March. The queen had arranged that her husband should ride in state with her to the opening ceremonial, after which she proposed to introduce him to the Estates of the realm as her consort, and to obtain from them his recognition as king and joint sovereign of the realm. But Darnley, haughty and headstrong as usual, protested that he would not occupy an inferior position, and that “unless he were allowed to act as the sovereign of Scotland, by opening the parliament himself, he would in no wise condescend to give his presence to that ceremonial.”* As the queen very properly refused to accede to these demands, Darnley rode down to Leith, “with seven or acht horse,” to amuse himself during the ceremony. Mary, therefore, opened the parliament in person, proceeding from the palace of Holyrood to the Tolbooth, the Parliament near St. Giles’s Church, the usual place of meeting, in “wondrous gorgeous apparel,” says Knox, “albeit the number of lords and train was not very great.” The Lords of the Articles were chosen—three of the lords spiritual being selected from the Romish prelates—a step which, as the queen herself admits, was intended to prepare the way for the restoration of the “auld religion.” The forfeiture against Moray and his associates was discussed on Friday and Saturday, with great diversity of opinion—some contending that the summons was not “well libelled or dressed,” while others thought that “the matter of treason was not sufficiently proved.” The influence of the queen and the Romish party eventually prevailed, and it was agreed that the forfeiture of the banished lords should be passed on the following Tuesday, the 12th of March.

It was on the evening of Saturday, the 9th of March, that the conspirators determined to strike the long meditated blow. In the dusk of that evening, about five hundred men, the retainers of Morton and the other lords, his accomplices, assembled secretly in the neighbourhood of Holyrood. They were all armed, and about seven o’clock, when it was dark, Morton, who took the command, admitted a hundred and fifty of them into the inner court of the palace; he then ordered the gates to be locked, and took possession of the keys. Meanwhile Darnley, along with George Douglas the Postulate,† and the Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, were waiting the signal to proceed to the queen’s chamber, where they expected to find their victim. It had been originally proposed to seize Riceio in his own apartment, but this plan was abandoned for two reasons:—First,

Because it was less certain, as it was often late before Riccio retired for the night; since he sometimes did not sleep in his own room at all, but in that of his brother; and since there were back-doors and windows, through which he might have effected his escape; and second, because it would not have so much intimidated Mary, and would have made it necessary to employ another party to secure her person.* At this moment Mary, altogether unsuspecting of danger, was at supper in a small closet which entered from her bedroom, in company with her illegitimate sister, the Countess of Argyle, her brother, the Lord Robert Stuart, Commendator of Holyrood, Beaton of Creich, the master of the household, Arthur Erskine, captain of the guard, and David Riccio.† One or two other servants of the Privy Chamber were in waiting at a side-table. Queen Mary's apartments in Holyrood, which still exist in nearly the same state in which they were on this eventful evening, consist of a presence-chamber, a bedroom opening from it, where her bed yet stands, although the furniture is now grievously dilapidated, and the small closet already referred to, containing one window, and only about twelve feet square. Darnley's rooms were on the ground-floor, immediately below those of the queen, with which they communicated by means of a secret turnpike stair. The approach to this stair, from the queen's room, is concealed by a piece of wainscot little more than a yard square, which hangs upon hinges in the wall. The conspirators had already been admitted to the king's apartment, and Darnley, ascending the private stair, entered the closet where Mary sat, and, seating himself beside her at table, placed his arm around her waist, and embraced her with every demonstration of affection.‡ A minute had scarcely elapsed, when Ruthven, clad in complete armour, pushed aside the tapestry which concealed the opening in the wall, abruptly entered the room, and threw himself unceremoniously into a chair. He had for some months been confined to a sick bed by an incurable disease, and his haggard appearance, his features pale and wasted by long illness, together with the naked sword which he brandished in his hand, and the coat of mail visible under the folds of his loose gown, were calculated to inspire the queen, who was now far advanced in pregnancy, with the utmost terror. But repressing all exclamations of surprise and fear, she said, "My lord, I was coming to visit you in your chamber, having been told you were very ill, and now you enter our presence in your armour. What does this mean?" The savage baron replied fiercely, "I have indeed been very ill, but I find myself well enough to come here for your good." Observing his threatening look and manner, the queen said, "And what good can you do me? You come not in the fashion of one who means well." "There is no harm intended to your person," replied Ruthven, "nor to any one, but yonder poltroon, David; it is he with whom I first to speak." "What hath he done?" inquired Mary. "Ask the king, your husband's cousin." Turning in surprise to Darnley, who had now risen and was leaning on the back of his chair, she demanded an explanation, but he hypocritically pretended ignorance, and declared he knew nothing of the matter. Mary on this, receiving a look of authority, commanded Ruthven immediately to be gone, and as he refused to comply, the master of the household and some of the servants attempted to expel him by force. "Lay no hands on me!" exclaimed the ruffian, brandishing his rapier, "for I will not be handled." At this moment one of the conspirators made his appearance with a horse-girdle in his hand, and was immediately followed by others who crowded up the private stair. "What is the meaning of this?" exclaimed Mary. "Do you seek my life?" "No, madam," replied Ruthven, "but we will have our yonder cousin, Darnley, at the same time attempting to seize the unhappy foreigner, who, scarcely knowing what he did, retreated into the recess of the window, with his dagger drawn in one hand, and clinging to the queen's gown with the other. "If my memory have been guilty of any misdeeds," said Mary to the assassins, "I promise to submit my name to the lords of the parliament, that he may be dealt with according to the usual course of justice." "Here is the man of justice's order," cried one of the murderers, producing a scroll. "Madam," said Riccio, "I am a dead man!" "Fie, not," she replied aloud, "the king will never suffer you to be slain in my presence, neither can he forget your faithful services."

In the midst of these alterations the outcry, "A Douglas—A Douglas!" was heard resounding throughout the gallery and Mary, with a band of his followers, consisting of the king which had assembled, rushed up the great staircase, and forced open the doors of the presence-chamber, the light of their torches gleaming on the tables, and the sound of their voices, and the crash of their weapons striking to the ground the trembling group at the upper end of the little room. The household servants fled in dismay, leaving the responsibility of allowing any offensive movement to the overwhelming superiority of the rebel band. The supper table, which had hitherto been placed between the trembling secretary and his assassins, was now overturned upon the queen; and had not the Countess of Argy's swift run to the rescue,

† Archbishop Spottiswood states that Riccio sat at table with the queen; Crawford, on the other hand, asserts that he was sitting at a side-table, as he always did when waiting; and Camden affirms that the secretary "was standing at the sideboard, eating something that had been sent to him from the queen's table;" but as Mr. Lawson remarks, the closet is so small that the distinction could be scarcely perceptible. ‡ Mary bitterly complained that her husband came to "betray her with a Judas' kiss."

in her hand as it was falling, the room would have been involved in darkness. Mary still strove to protect her unhappy servant, and with tears, entreaties, and threatenings, adjured the murderers to proceed according to the forms of justice against their miserable victim, who, catching in his despair at the word, clung to her robe, calling out "Giustizia! Giustizia! suave ma vie, Madama, suave ma vie!" The first man who struck Riccio was the Postulate, George Douglas, who stabbed him over the queen's shoulder with the dagger which the king wore at his side. Others followed the example; and Darnley, having forcibly unloosed the tenacious grasp with which the poor bleeding secretary clung to the queen's gown, he was torn from her knees, and dragged, amidst shouts and hideous oaths, through the bedroom to the door of the presence-chamber, where the conspirators, gathering about him, speedily completed the bloody deed. So eager were they to take part in the murder, that they wounded one another in the struggle, and the body of their wretched victim, mangled by no fewer than fifty-six wounds, was left in a pool of blood, with the king's dagger sticking in it, to show, as was alleged, that he had sanctioned the murder.† The body was afterwards thrown down the stairs, dragged to the porter's lodge, stripped naked,‡ and treated with every mark of indignity. It was obscurely buried, next day, in the Canongate churchyard; but at a subsequent period it was removed to the cemetery of Holyrood Chapel.

During the perpetration of this horrid deed, Darnley, who at first "stood amazed, and wist not what to do," in compliance with the injunction of Ruthven, took the queen in his arms, and forcing her into a chair, stood behind it, and held her so tightly embraced, that she could not rise. Ker of Faldonside, one of the most ferocious of the conspirators, held a pistol to her breast, and with a furious imprecation told her he would shoot her dead if she offered any resistance.§ The weapon

‡ He was dressed on that fatal night in a rich evening dress of black figured damask, faced with fur (called, in the nomenclature of the period, a "night-gown"), with a satin doublet and russet-coloured velvet hose; and he wore a rich jewel round his neck, which was never heard of after his death. "Of the great substance he had there is much spoken. Some say, in gold, to the value of two thousand pounds sterling. His apparel was very good; as it is said, fourteen pair of velvet hose. His chamber well furnished; armour, daggs (horse-pistols), pistols, harquebusses, twenty-two swords. Of all this nothing spoiled nor lacking saving two or three daggs. He had the custody of all the queen's letters which were delivered unlooked upon."—Hedford and Randolph to Cecil, Berwick, 27th March, 1566.

§ "There comes the fierce fanatic Ruthven—party-hatred enabling him to bear the armour which would otherwise weigh down a form enfeebled by wasting disease. See how his writhen features show under the hollow helmet, like those of a corpse tenanted by a demon, whose vindictive purpose looks out at the flashing eyes, while the visage was hastily turned aside by Darnley, but Mary afterwards declared that "she felt the coldness of the iron through her dress, and that Faldonside had actually pulled the trigger, but that the pistol hung fire." It is also asserted that Patrick Bellen-den, the brother of the Justice-clerk, aimed a stroke at the queen with a sword or dagger; but Anthony Standen, her page, parried the blow, by striking the weapon aside with the torch he had been holding to light the music score which the queen and Riccio, with others of the company, had been singing in parts that evening.* This statement, however, was vehemently denied by Ruthven and Morton, who "take God to record that there was not one stroke in her presence, nor was David stricken till he was at the farther door of her majesty's antechamber, and that there was no evil meant to the queen's body."†

Mary's own account of these shocking events is worthy of recital:—"Upon the 9th day of March instant, we being at even about seven hours (seven o'clock) in our cabinet at our supper, sociated with our sister the Countess of Argyle, our brother the Commendator of Holyrood-house, the Laird of Creich, Arthur Erskine, and certain others our domestic servitors, in quiet manner, especially by reason of an evil disposition being counselled to sustain ourselves with flesh [it was Lent], having almost passed to the end of seven months in our birth [that is, she was seven months gone with child], the king our husband came to us in our cabinet, and placed him beside us at our supper. The Earl of Morton and Lord Lindsay, with their assisters, boden in warlike manner [arrayed in armour] to the number of eight score persons, or thereby, kept and occupied the whole entry of our palace of

(From the Art Treasures of England)

Holyrood House, so that, as they believed, it was not possible to any person to escape forth of the same. In the meantime, the Lord Ruthven, boden in like manner, with his accomplices, took entry perforce in our cabinet, and there, seeing our secretary, David Riccio, among our other servants, declared he had to speak to him. In this instant, we required the king our husband, if he knew anything of that enterprise, who denied the same. Also, we commanded the Lord Ruthven, under pain of treason, to avoid him forth of our presence, declaring we should exhibit the said David before the lords of parliament, to be punished, if any sort he had offended. Notwithstanding, the said Lord Ruthven perforce invaded him in our presence; he [David] then for refuge took safeguard, and retired him behind our back, and Ruthven, with his accomplices, cast down our table upon ourself, put violent hands upon him, struck him over our shoulder with whingers, one part of them standing before our face with bended daggs [cocked pistols], most cruelly took him forth of our cabinet, and at the entry of our chamber gave him fifty-six strokes with whingers and swords. In doing thereof, we were not only struck with great dreadour, but also by sundry considerations was most justly induced to take extreme fear of our life.*

Mary and Darnley were left alone together in Mary's danger the cabinet while the assassins and terror. completed their bloody work, she continuing to intercede, with tears, for the life of her unhappy favourite, and her husband assuring her that "no harm was intended." One of Darnley's equerries now entered the room, and Mary eagerly inquired "whether David had been put in ward, and where." "Madam," replied the equerry, "it is useless to speak of David, for the man is dead." This was corroborated by one of the ladies, who rushed into the room, and exclaimed, that "she had seen the mangled remains of the murdered man," and "that it was said all had been done by the king's order." "Is it so?" said the queen; "I will then dry my tears, and study revenge!" But, overcome by the horrors of the scene which she had witnessed, she soon after fell into a swoon, from which, however, she was speedily roused by the entrance of Ruthven, who, reeking from the scene of blood, staggered into the cabinet, and throwing himself upon a seat, called for a cup of wine, complaining that "he was sore felled by his sickness." "Is this your malady?" said the queen, as the ferocious ruffian eagerly drained the goblet, which one of her French pages filled and brought to him. "God forbid your majesty had such," he rejoined. A most undignified scene of mutual reerimination now took place between the queen and her wretched husband, in which he accused her, in gross terms, of too great familiarity with Riccio, while she indignantly declared that she would live with him as his wife no longer. Ruthven here interposed with a remark on conjugal duties, which drew down upon him the sarcastic rejoinder from Mary—"Others have done the like; why may I not leave him as well as your wife did her husband?" "If her secretary were really slain," she said, "it should be done blind to some of them." "God forbid," replied Ruthven, "for the more your grace showeth yourself offended, the world will judge the worse." Mary told him that "if she and her infant perished, she would leave the revenge thereof to her royal kindred in France and Spain." Ruthven rejoined, that "these noble princes were overgreat persons to meddle with such a poor man as he was; and that if she or her child perished, or any other evil befel the queen in consequence of what was done that night, she must blame her husband, and not any of them." "I trust," was Mary's spirited reply, "that God, who beholdeth this from the high heavens, will avenge my wrongs, and more that which shall be born of me to root out you and your treacherous posterity!"—a denunciation which was strikingly fulfilled in the total ruin of the house of Ruthven, in the reign of Mary's son.

A great clamour now arose below, from the court and lobbies of the palace, and Lord Gray, one of the conspirators, knocked at the door of the royal chamber, to announce that Huntley, Bothwell, and other lords, with their officers and servants, were attempting to rescue the queen, and were fighting in the close with the Earl of Moray and his retainers, who had been entrusted with the guarding the gates of the palace. Ruthven immediately left the room to quell the tumult, telling Darnley, who offered to go down, to "remain where he was, and entertain the queen in the meantime." Huntley and Bothwell, finding themselves greatly outnumbered, consented to a parley with Ruthven, who informed them that the plot was "all revealed by the king, and that the hardened heads were crushed, and would arrive before day;" and assured them "that all disputes should be made up between them and Moray and Argyll to their satisfaction," whereupon they shook hands and drank together. In spite of Ruthven's fair words, however, and their apparent confidence in his assurances, Bothwell and Huntley, knowing that they were probably obnoxious to the conspirators, had no time in obtaining their escape through a window towards the garden on the north side of the palace, where some lions and other wild animals were kept. The Earl of Atholl, the Lords Forrester and Galloway, and Sir James Ralston, were perceived quondam to retire, which they readily did, in fear of their lives. Ruthven, after the termination of the interference with Bothwell and Huntley, returned to the queen's chamber, and received his brutal attack on the unhappy princess; assuming her of tyranny and misgovernment, and asserting that she had for a long time been under the influence of "a cunning Italian, who had ruled and guided the country without the ability and counsel, especially against those noblemen that were banished, and entertaining of amity with foreign princes and nations, with whom she was confederate;" and informing her that the exiled lords "had been sent for by the king, and would return on the morrow, to take part with them against her."

Meanwhile, the friends of the queen, who had succeeded in effecting their escape, made known Abortive attempt her perilous situation to the provost at a rescue. of the city, Preston of Craigmillar, who caused the common bell to be rung, and at the head of five hundred burgesses, who hastily assembled in arms at the summons, hurried to the palace, and demanded to see and speak with their sovereign, that she might personally assure them of her welfare. But Mary was not permitted to approach the windows, or to hold any intercourse with her faithful subjects; and, as she afterwards wrote to her ambassador in France, she "was extremely threatened by the traitors, who in her face declared that, if she spoke to the townspeople, they would cut her in collops, and cast her over the walls."* In her stead, her despicable husband, being thrust forward, opened the window, and informed the crowd that the queen and he were well, and did not require their assistance. "Let us see our queen, and hear her speak for herself!" was the exclamation of the provost and his followers; to which Darnley imperiously rejoined—"Provost, know you not I am king? I command you and your company to pass home to your houses." The citizens, in a state of great irritation, threatened to devote the queen's enemies in the palace to fire and sword; but on being solemnly assured by the conspirators "that the Italian secretary was slain, because he had been detected in an intrigue with the Pope, the King of Spain, and other foreign potentates, for the purpose of destroying the true Evangile, and introducing Popery again into Scotland," they consented to return home.†

The poor queen was by this time in such a state of faintness and complete exhaustion as to be incapable of utterance; and Ruthven, perceiving at length that she was very ill, proposed to Darnley that they should retire and leave her to take some repose; which they accordingly did, taking care, however, to station a sufficient guard at the door of her chamber. "All that night," says Mary, "we were detained in a captivity within our chamber, and not permitted to have intercommunion scarcely with our servant women."‡

"The next morning being Sunday," says Sir James Melvil, "I was letten forth of the gates, for I lay therein. Passing through the outer close, the queen's majesty was looking forth of a window and cried unto me to help her. Then I drew near unto the window, and asked, 'What help lay in my power, for that I should give?' she said, 'Go to the provost of Edinburgh, and bid him convene the town with speed, and come and release me out of these traitors' hands; but run fast,' she said, 'for they will stay you.' The words were scarcely spoken when Nisbet, master of the household to the Earl of Lennox, was sent with a company to stay me, to whom I gave good words, and said, 'I was only passing to the preaching at St. Giles's church,' for it was Sunday; but I went with speed to the provost, and told him my commission from the queen;" but the provost alleged that he did not know how to act, for he had received contrary commands from the king, and besides, the people, he said, were not disposed to take up arms to revenge Riccio's death. Sir James was, therefore, obliged to send word to the queen through one of her ladies, that he could not effect her release.*

Darnley, in the meantime, assuming the supreme power, issued his royal letters, dissolving the parliament, and enjoining all the members to leave the capital within three hours, "under pain of loss of life, lands, and goods, except only such as the king by his special command caused to remain." Proclamation was also made at the market cross, that none but Protestants should be suffered to leave their houses; and the magistrates were enjoined to arm a strong guard to enforce obedience to these arbitrary mandates.†

Mary was now fully alive to the horrors of her situation,—a prisoner in the hands of a band of brutal assassins, by whom all her motions were watched, she had too good reason to suspect that they would not scruple at any measures to accomplish their purposes. These apprehensions threw her into a state of delirious agony, in which she imagined that Ruthven was coming to murder her; and so great was her excitement and terror, that she was in danger of a miscarriage.‡ No person was allowed to enter her chamber without the express permission of the conspirators, and it was not without the greatest difficulty, and after several hours' delay, that Darnley, who had begun to relent at the sight of his consort's distress, obtained permission for her gentlwomen to go to her assistance. Morton and Ruthven strongly objected to this concession, alleging that "it would be extremely hazardous, as they feared the queen would be able through her ladies to communicate with her nobles."§ The suspicions of these crafty and cold-blooded plotters were well founded, for Mary speedily availed herself of the services of her faithful attendants to carry out a project for her deliverance. Through the agency of Mary Livingston, the black box containing the queen's secret foreign correspondence, and the keys of her various ciphers, was brought from David Riccio's chamber, where it had been deposited. Letters were then written and sent to the Earls of Atholl, Argyle, Bothwell, and other barons friendly to the queen, and intimation was also conveyed to Arthur Erskine, and several other trustworthy servants, of her intention to attempt her escape to Seton-house. The conspirators meanwhile kept a strict watch on the queen and her female attendants, and, so strong were their apprehensions that she might escape from their grasp, that they issued strict orders that no lady should be allowed to pass "muffled" from the queen's chamber;* and, knowing Darnley's weak and vacillating character, and observing some symptoms of returning affection for his beautiful consort, they expressed their dissatisfaction when he informed them that he had so effectually soothed the terrors of his royal wife that she had consented that he should pass the night with her. Morton having declared that "it was necessary that he, as chancellor, should confer with the queen on the subject of the crown-matrimonial, and also that of the return of the banished lords," Mary granted him the audience which, indeed, she had no power to refuse. On entering her chamber he said, that "he had not come to ask pardon in the case of David, seeing he was wholly innocent of his slaughter, but to inquire her pleasure about the Estates of parliament, and whether she meant to deny the crown-matrimonial to her husband." "My cousin," replied the queen, "I have never refused to honour my husband to the utmost of my power, and since I have espoused him, I have continually procured for him everything I could for his aggrandisement, but the persons to whom the king now gives his confidence are those who have always dissuaded me from it." To this implied reproach, Morton, who was one of the most prominent of the advisers referred to, answered only by urging her to do what was required of her; but Mary refused, observing that, "as she was a prisoner, all she might do would be invalid, and foreign princes would say that her subjects had given laws to their sovereign—an example very improper to establish."†

In the course of the evening the Earls of Moray and Rothes, Kirkaldy of Grange, and the other banished lords, according to previous concert, arrived in the capital, escorted by a thousand horsemen under the command of Lord Home, and proceeded straight to the palace, where they were cordially welcomed by Darnley. As soon as Mary heard of their arrival she instantly sent for Moray, and, throwing herself into his arms, kissed and embraced him many times, exclaiming at the same time, "If my brother had been here, he never would have allowed me to be so cruelly handled!"‡ Tears fell from Moray's eyes at this pathetic appeal; and "seeing our state and entertainment," says Mary, "he was moved with natural affection towards us."§ She assured him that "it was no fault of hers that he had been so long away, for it was well known she would have restored him long ago, but for displeasing others;" and told him "he was welcome, and promised if he would return to his allegiance and be a good subject, she would be to him all he could require."* Moray, in reply, "protested his innocence of ever having entertained evil intentions against her," declared that he had no power to restore her to liberty, as she urgently entreated him to do, but made many professions of his good will and compassion for her sufferings. His obligations, however, to the men who had benefited their estates and lives on his arduous campaign to labour for their safety, and he at once assumed the lead in their councils. Mary asserts that they meditated the darkest designs against her authority and person: "Upon the morn," she says, "Moray assembled the enterprisers of this late crime, and such of our rebels as came with him; in their council they thought it most expedient we should be warded in our castle of Stirling, there to remain till we had approved in parliament all their wished enterprises, established their religion, and given to the king the crown-matrimonial, or else, by all appearance, firmly purposed to have put us to death."†

Darnley, meanwhile, was seized with the irresolution and fear which it has been justly said, in minds like his, often follow acts of extravagant violence. The queen observed his vacillation, as well as the symptoms of his returning affection, and, exerting all her powers of fascination, she succeeded in disengaging him from his blood-stained associates. Appearing at once to his fears and his sympathy, she represented to him that he was a mere tool in the hands of men who were equally hostile to him as to her; that their barbarous proceedings had periled the life both of his consort and of his unborn infant; and that, to justify their guilty ambition, they would not hesitate to destroy him as soon as he had served their purpose. The weak and facile king was easily won by her persuasive arguments, and restrained her forgiveness, offering at the same time to do anything she desired. It was then agreed between them that Mary should appear resigned to her situation, and express her willingness to sign and publish every-

* Randolph and Bedford to Cecil.

† Such suspicions were natural in Mary's situation, and some of her partisans affirm that the conspirators had formally determined to proceed to the utmost extremities against their sovereign. If these assertions are to be believed, a select meeting was held on the Sabbath evening at Morton's house to determine the question of Mary's life or death. The matter was referred to the instance of Moray, who unhesitatingly gave his royal consent for the royal sister, declaring that the conspirators must go so far to proceed with safety, for they could expect no grace from the queen, therefore it behoved them to take such measures as the laws of self-preservation permitted. And even if it were possible for a portion of her high spirit to forgive such an outrage, there could be no security for their religion if she were restored to her throne, as it is "Some of the more sensible of her party, however, alleged, having proposed that she should be confined to some strict place of confinement, and not to be visited till after the birth of her child, in whose name she should govern under the title of a Council of Regency." "The queen replied that delays were dangerous, and it was not wise to themselves in a perilous situation, and it was not to be dally." These statements, however, rest only on the authority of violent partisans, whose evidence is wholly unworthy of credit. thing the conspirators demanded; and Darnley informed Morton and his accomplices that he had prevailed upon the queen to grant them an audience, and "to forgive all their offences, which she would dismiss from her mind, as though they had never been." They strongly distrusted the queen's sincerity, however, and insisted that she meant only to betray them. "It is all words," said they, "and instead of your persuading her, we fear she will persuade you to her desire, for she has been trained up in the court of France. Fair speaking is but policy, and such promises will never be performed."* But Darnley insisted that Mary was a true princess, and declared that he would stake his life for her faith and honour.† On the afternoon of Monday, the 11th, he led the principal conspirators to her chamber, where she listened to their defence and their promises of obedience for the future, and assured them of her readiness to pardon their offence, bidding them "prepare their own securities, and she would subscribe them." But as they still manifested their distrust of her promises, and their reluctance to remove their guards from the palace, on the evening of the same day another conference took place, the particulars of which are thus recorded by a contemporary writer:—"And all the 11th of March our sovereign lady was holden in captivity within her chamber in Holyrood-house till even; and at even it was convened between our said sovereign lady and all the lords committers of the slaughter, except my Lord Ruthven (whom she would not allow to come in her presence, because he was the principal man that came in her cabinet to commit the said slaughter), and with all the remaining lords banished before, as said is, that her majesty would give them remission for all crimes bygone unto the said eleventh day; and albeit she would subscribe their remission instantly, she said, because she was holden in captivity, it would do them no good; and to satisfy them more pleasantly, she said she would pass the morn, God willing, to the Tolbooth, and there, by consent of parliament, make an act of remission to them for the crimes above written; and, this said, she drank to every one of them in special."‡ Having promised this formal remission of their crime, Mary requested the conspirators "to deliver the keys of her palace to her servants, and leave her chamber to her own officials the same as it was wont to be, because for the last two nights she had taken no rest." Darnley enforced her request, promising "to be her keeper himself for that night, and to take very good care of her, if so be they would rid the palace of strangers, and trust her in his hands;"§ and also representing that she was now so ill and exhausted, that she could scarcely stand, and was therefore wholly unable to make any efforts to escape. Morton, Ruthven, and their associates, showed the greatest reluctance to consent to this arrangement; and Ruthven, in particular, protested that "whatever bloodshed or mischief should ensue thereupon, should fall upon the king's head and his posterity." Darnley answered that "he would warrant them all;" and the conspirators at length, with many misgivings, withdrew their retainers from the palace, permitted the household servants to resume their charge, and went to sup at the house of Morton, the chancellor.

To lull suspicion, the queen and her husband retired to rest; but two hours after midnight they arose, and attended only by one maid, stealthily descended a secret stair to a postern leading through the cemetery of the chapel royal, at the outer gate of which Lord Traquair, the captain of the guard, Arthur Erskine, the queen's equerry, Sir William Standen, Darnley's master of the horse, and Bastian, one of the household servants, were in waiting. Mary was placed on horseback behind Arthur Erskine. Lord Traquair took her maid behind him,* and, thus arranged, the little cavalcade, consisting of seven persons, left the precincts of the palace unperceived, and arrived in safety at Seton-house, where Lord Seton was in readiness, with two hundred armed men, to escort his sovereign and her consort to Dunbar, which they reached before sunrise.† Their intentions had been communicated to Huntley and Bothwell, and these powerful nobles hastened, with their retainers, to join the royal standard. Great numbers of the barons and gentry of the kingdom speedily followed their example, and the queen, in a few days, found herself at the head of an army of eight thousand men.

The conspirators were filled with consternation when they heard that the queen had escaped from their grasp, and that all their plans were completely frustrated by the defection of Darnley, and his reconciliation with his consort. It soon became evident that they would find no support in the country, and that all ranks were prepared to rally round the throne, and to defend their sovereign against the perpetrators of the brutal murder which had been committed in her presence. In this altered state of affairs, the conspirators dispatched Lord Sempill to Dunbar, with an humble supplication to her majesty to sign their securities, and perform the other articles of her engagement; but he was dismissed with an unfavourable answer. It soon became evident that Mary did not consider herself bound by any promises extorted from her while a prisoner in the hands of the murderers of Riccio. She directed a writ of treason to be issued against Morton, Lethington, and their accomplices, and summoned her faithful subjects to meet her in arms at Muselburgh, on the 17th of March. The rebel confederacy immediately broke up. The Earls of Flight of the Rothcs and Glencairn hastened to conspirators. Dunbar, threw themselves on the mercy of their sovereign, and were pardoned; while Lethington retired to Dunkeld, and Morton, Ruthven, Lindsay, Kerr, and George Douglas, fled with the utmost precipitation to Newcastle. After remaining five days at Dunbar, the queen proceeded to Haddington, where she held a council (March 17th), and made various important changes in her administration. Morton was deprived of the office of Lord Chancellor, which was bestowed on the Earl of Huntley; Sir James Balfour was made Clerk-register, in the room of McGill; Lethington was stripped of the rich abbacy of Haddington, which was transferred to the Earl of Bothwell. This highly-favoured noble was also reinstated in his hereditary office of Lord Admiral, confirmed in the appointment of Lieutenant-General of Scotland, and made Captain of Dunbar, so that the whole military force of the crown was confided to his charge.

In the critical situation in which the queen was now placed, she prudently resolved to make a distinction between the old and the new rebels, and to pardon the Earl of Moray and the other insurgent lords, on condition that they should detach themselves from the murderers of Riccio. To this they readily agreed. Moray sent Sir James Melvil to the queen at Haddington, with

Moray and his associates pardoned. letters protesting his own innocence, and his repudiation of those who had committed the late odious crime, solemnly pledging himself to have nothing more to do with them; on which Mary immediately signed the remission for her brother, and the other barons who had returned with him from England, merely stipulating that they should "nowise apply themselves to the last conspirators, and should retire themselves into Argyle during her will."

Next day (March 18) the queen and her husband returned to the capital, escorted by the nobles of her party and their followers, amounting to about nine thousand men, and took up her residence, not in the palace of Holyrood, but in Lord Home's house, in the High-street, called the old Bishop of Dunkeld's lodging. Mary's first care was to protect her consort from the consequences of his crime, by granting him full remission for every kind of treason that could be laid to his charge, "that if, in case of her death," she said, "proceedings should be instituted against him, he might be able to plead her forgiveness." Darnley himself, it is supposed by Mary's desire, appeared before the Council, on the 29th of March, and most solemnly protested that "he was innocent of the late treason and slaughter committed in the Abbey of Holyrood, and the detention of the queen; that he never counselled, commanded, consented, assisted, nor approved the same; and that all he had to do with it was, his being so far overseen as to give consent, unknown to her majesty, for the return of the Earl of Moray and the other lords from England." On the next day, proclamation to the same effect was made at the Cross, and it was forbidden, under penalty of treason, for any one to say that the king was either art or part in the conspiracy. Proceedings were immediately instituted against Morton, Ruthven, and the rest of the fugitive conspirators, who were summoned to answer for their offences, and having failed to appear, they were outlawed, and their possessions forfeited to the crown. Seven of the murderers of Riccio were brought to trial, but only two of them were executed—"Henry Yair, formerly a priest, but now a retainer of Lord Ruthven, and Thomas Scott, sheriff-depute of Perth." Two others, Harlaw and Mowbray, burghesses of Edinburgh, were also condemned to death, but were executed at the place of execution, through the intervention of the Earl of Bothwell.

Darnley, not contented with having deserted his fellow-conspirators, and publicly denying all knowledge of the conspiracy, begged himself to bring his accomplices to justice, and strove to influence the queen's resentment against them: "As they have brewed, so let them drink," was his contemptuous remark, when he was informed that they had sought refuge in flight.* This behaviour naturally enraged them to the utmost, and they revenged themselves by accusing him as the contriver of the plot, and laying before the queen the evidence of his guilt. "The queen," writes Randolph to Cecil, "hath seen all the covenants and bonds that passed between the king and the lords, and now findeth that his declaration before her and the Council of his innocency of the death of David was false, and is grievously offended that by their means he should seek to come to the crown matrimonial." Mary was deeply wounded by this discovery. She had before this lamented to Melvil "the king's folly, unthankfulness, and misbehaviour," but he was now proved to be a traitor and a liar, alike to his consort and to his associates. "That very power which, with liberal and unmerciful fondness, she had conferred upon him, he had employed to insult her authority, to usurp her prerogative, and to endanger her person; such an outrage it was impossible any woman could bear or forgive. Cold civilities, sweet discourses, frequent quarrels, succeeded to their former transports of affection and confidence. The queen's favours were no longer conveyed through his hands. The crowd of expectants ceased to court his patronage, which they found to avail so little. Among the nobles, some dreaded his furious temper, others complained of his perfidiousness, and all of them despised the weakness of his understanding and the inconstancy of his heart. * * * The aversion of the queen for him increased every day, and could no longer be concealed. He was often absent from court, appeared there with little splendour, and was trusted with no power. Avoided equally by those who endeavoured to please the queen, who favoured Morton and his associates, or who adhered to the house of Hamilton, he was left almost alone in a neglected and unpitied solitude.* Smarting under the distrust and contempt with which he was now regarded, he passionately exclaimed, "That since he was held in so little account, he repented him of having forsaken the lords."† It is said that he even attempted to form a new confederacy with Moray and Argyle, but they prudently refused to hold any communication with him.

The situation of the unhappy queen at this Her trying critical period was exceedingly situation. perplexing. Betrayed by her own husband, and surrounded by selfish, unprincipled, and treacherous counsellors, she knew not where to turn for assistance and trustworthy advice. In the extremity of her wretchedness, she at one time entertained the design of retiring to France, and entrusting the government of her realm to a provisional regency, composed of five of her principal lords—Moray, Mar, Bothwell, Atholl, and Huntly.‡ It was even reported at the time that she meditated a divorce from her worthless husband, and that she had sent an envoy, named Thornton, to Rome for that purpose.§ In a letter written about this period to one of her female relatives in France, she says touchingly, "It will grieve you to hear how entirely, in a very short time, I have changed my character, from that of the most easily satisfied and care-chasing of mortals, to one embroiled in constant turmoils and perplexities." "She was sad and pensive," says Sir James Melvil, "for the late foul act committed in her presence so irreverently. So many great sighs she would give, that it was pity to hear her, and over few were careful to comfort her."

In the midst of these anxieties and griefs, the time for the queen's delivery drew near, and, by the advice of her Privy Council, she went to reside in the castle of Edinburgh, as the place of greatest security, till the birth of the expected heir to the crown. Here she received a visit from Mauvissière de Castelnau, who was sent by the king and Queen-mother of France to congratulate the Scottish queen on her escape from her recent peril. In the train of the French ambassador came Joseph Riccio, David's brother, whom Mary appointed to the office of secretary, left vacant by the murder—an unpopular step—which, however, may be excused, if not justified, by the difficulty of finding among her courtiers a trustworthy person to whom she could confide the charge of her private correspondence. As the time of her confinement approached, her resentment towards Darnley appears to have somewhat abated, and she exerted herself, with considerable success, to com- Her exertions pose the differences between Moray, to reconcile her nobles. Huntley, Bothwell, Atholl, Argyle, and others of her nobles, who had long been at deadly feud with each other, and prevailed upon them to meet amicably at a banquet which she gave to celebrate their reconciliation.* Her mind seems to have been haunted with the apprehension of a fresh attack, at this critical moment, from the murderers of Riccio, and she sent an earnest request to the English queen that she would not continue to harbour those traitors who had sought her life. In answer to this re- Elizabeth's duplicity. monstrance, Elizabeth assured her sister sovereign that she had dismissed Morton and his associates from her dominions—a statement which was, however, not consistent with truth; for though they were ordered to depart from Newcastle, it was at the same time significantly hinted to them that "England was a wide field, and they would find as good accommodation elsewhere, and nearer Scotland;" and they accordingly shifted their quarters to Alnwick, a few miles from the Scottish border. Early in June, Mary wrote letters to her principal nobility, requiring their presence in the metropolis, as the time of her confinement was at hand. She then made her will, which she caused to be thrice transcribed; one copy was sent to France, a second committed to the charge of her Privy Council, and the third she kept herself.† The day preceding her delivery she wrote with her own hand a letter to Elizabeth, announcing the event, but leaving a blank "to be filled," says Melvil, "either with a son or a daughter, as it might please God to grant unto her."

On Wednesday, the 19th of June, the queen was safely delivered of a son, "whose Birth of birth was happy for the whole James VI. island, and unfortunate to her alone." The happy tidings of the safety of the queen, and birth of the heir to the throne, were announced by a discharge of the castle guns, which were within a few yards of the royal bed. About two o'clock the same afternoon Darnley came to visit the queen, and expressed a desire to see the child. "My lord," said Mary, "God has given you and me a son, whose paternity is of none but you." Darnley blushed as he stooped and kissed the child. Mary then taking the infant in her arms, and uncovering his face, said to her husband, "My lord, here I protest to God, and as I shall answer to them at the great day of judgment, this is your son, and no other man's son. He is indeed so much your son, that I only fear it will be the worse for him hereafter." Then turning to Sir W. Standen, Darnley's principal English servant, Mary added, "This is the son whom I hope shall first unite the two kingdoms of Scotland and England."—"Why, madam," answered Sir William, "shall he succeed before your majesty and his father?"—"Alas!" replied Mary, "his father has broken to me." Hearing these words, Darnley, who still stood near, said, "Sweet madam, is this your promise that you made to forget and forgive all?"—"I have forgiven all," observed the queen, "but will never forget. What if Faudonside's pistol had shot—what would have become of him and me both, and what estate would you have been in? God only knows, but we may suspect."—"Madam," answered Darnley, "these things are all past."—"Then," said the queen, "let them go."*

The intelligence of the birth of the heir to the throne was received everywhere throughout Scotland with demonstrations of the greatest joy. "As the birth of a prince," says Keith, "was one of the greatest of blessings that God could bestow upon this poor, divided land, so was the same most thankfully acknowledged by all ranks of people, according as the welcome news thereof reached their ears." In Edinburgh, all the nobility in town, accompanied by a vast concourse of the citizens, went in solemn procession next day to the High Church, and offered up thanksgiving to God for the safety of the queen, and the national blessing which had been granted in the birth of an heir to the crown. The General Assembly of the Church at the same time met, and agreed to send Spottiswood, the Superintendent of Lothian, the father of Archbishop Spottiswood of St. Andrew's, to congratulate the queen upon her delivery, and to request her to permit her son to be baptised and brought up in the Protestant faith. Mary received the superintendent very graciously, but she smiled and was silent when he expressed the wishes of his brethren respecting the education of the prince. She commanded the child to be brought into the room, and shown to the venerable divine. Taking the infant in his arms, he fell upon his knees, and uttered an earnest prayer in behalf of the new-born heir to the crown. At its conclusion, he playfully asked the babe to "say Amen for himself;" and some little cooing murmur having, it is said, escaped the unconscious lips of the child, Mary was much pleased, and "ever after called the superintendent her Amen. The young prince did the same, when he was old enough to understand the story, and whilst he lived did respect and reverence him as his spiritual father."†

Sir James Melvil was immediately dispatched to London with the tidings of the auspicious event of an heir to the Scottish throne. He took horse at noon, and rode to Berwick that night, and on the fourth day he reached London—a degree of despatch very unusual in those times. Melvil found Elizabeth at Greenwich, "where her majesty was in great merriness, and dancing after supper. But so soon as the secretary, Cecil, sounded in her ears the news of the prince's birth, all merriness was laid aside for that night, every one that was present marvelled what might mean so sudden a change; for the queen sat down with her hand on her haffet (cheek), and bursting out to some of her ladies how that the Queen of Scotland was the mother of a fine son, and that she was but a barren stock." On the following morning, however, when Melvil had his audience, she behaved with her usual duplicity. The joyful tidings, she said, had cured her of a fifteen days' sickness; "therefore she welcomed him with a merry countenance, and thanked him for the diligence he had used in hastening to give her that welcome intelligence." "Then I requested her majesty," says Melvil, "to be a gossip unto the queen, for our country are called gossips in England, which she granted gladly to be. Then I said her majesty would have a fair occasion to see the queen, which she had so oft desired. At this she smiled, and said that she would wish that her estate and affairs might permit her, and promised to send both honorable lords and ladies to supply her room."‡

Letter from Andreas de Moravia and William Wallace to the Mayors and Commons of Lubeck and Hamburg, dated October 11, 1297.

"Andreas de Moravia et Wilhelmus Wallace, duces exercitus regni Scotie et Communitas eadem regni, providis viris et discretis ac amice dilectis, majoribus et communitibus de Lubeck et de Hamburg, salutem et sinceram dilectionis semper incrementum.

"Nobis per fide dignos mercatores dicti regni Scotie est intimatum, quod vos vestri gratia, in omnibus causis et negotiis, nos et ipsos mercatoribus tangentibus, consulentes, auxiliantes et favorabiles estis, licet nostra non prececeriat merita, et idcirco magis vobis tenemur ad gratas cum digna remuneracione, ad quam vobis volumus obligari; rogantes vos, quatinus prececonisari facere velitis inter mercatores vestros, quod accerum mercatorum ad nos portus regni Scotie possint habere cum mercatoribus suis, quia regnum Scotie, Deo propitiante, ab Anglorum potestate bello est recuperatum. — Valeat.

"Datum apud Badingtonam (Haddington) in Scotia, undecimo de Octobris, anno Gratie, millesimo ducentesimo nonagesimo septimo. Rogamus vos insuper ut negocia Johannis Burget, et Johannis Frere mercatorum nostrorum, promovendi dignemini, prout nos negocia mercatorum vestrorum promoveri velitis. — Valeat. Datum ut prius." — Wallace Papers, No. xv.

At the time when this letter was written, there was a great dearth, and famine raged in Scotland, and Wallace led his army into England for the purpose of living upon the enemy. The letter to the cities of Lubeck and Hamburg was evidently written on the march into Northumberland. We learn from Langstaff's Chronicle, that Wallace sent a mission to Flanders immediately after the battle of Stirling.

"After this batalle, the Scotie went over the se
A boy of their race, yung and digne
To Flanders had him fare, through lang and dre
Of Edward where he ware to tryng that wayne."

It is probable that this boy or page who was sent to spy out the motions of Edward, was the bearer of the letter to the cities of Lubeck and Hamburg.

Battle of Falkirk.

Special mention is made by the English historians of the tall and stately person, as well as the unswerving faith, of the Scottish hero, and their overthrow has been thus described by an elegant, modern poetess, whose subject led her to "The decisive victory of Stirling Bridge had been gained a month before this letter was written."

treat of the calamitous engagement in which they fell :—

“The glance of the morn had sparkled bright
On their plumage green and their accions light ;
The bugle was strung at each hunter's side,
As they had been bound to the chase to ride ;
But the bugle is mute, and the shafts are spent,
The arm unnerved, and the bow unbent,
And the tired forester is laid
Far, far from the clustering greenwood shade !
Sore have they toiled—they are fallen asleep,
And their slumber is heavy, and dull, and deep !
When over their bones the grass shall wave,
When the wild winds over their tombs shall rave, Memory shall lean on their graves, and tell How Selkirk's hunters bold around old Stewart fell !”

Surrender of Stirling Castle.

“The form of the reddition of Stirling is a singular instrument, and well deserving the perusal of every one who wishes to read manners as well as events in the history of past ages. John Bouhs (l. Bushe), of the City of London, papal notary, has recorded it : ‘In the year of the incarnation of our Lord, 1304, in the second year of indiction, on the 24th July, and on the eve of the feast of St. James the Apostle, in presence of me, notary-public subscribing, and of the witnesses subscribing, specially called and also required to witness the premises in a certain valley, upon a certain road, which leads to a certain gate of the castle of Stirling, in the kingdom of Scotland and diocese of St. Andrew's, at the command of our sovereign lord the King aforesaid, appeared certain noble and discreet persons, viz., the Lords Ralph de Monthermer, of Gloucester, and Richard de Burgh, of Ulster, earls, &c. After a minute narrative of the treaty of capitulation, he adds, ‘Quibus per ipsum constabularium intellectis, viginti quinque personas de ipso castro secumduxit, quorum unus, ordinis sancti Dominici predicatorem, et alius de domo de Kelso fuere, quos usque ad tunicas denudatos, zonis projectis, dictis religiosis exceptis, quos unà cum aliis sparsis crinibus, flexis genibus, et eorum junctis manibus, et coram eodem Rege etiam electatis, unà secum suam, eidem Regi suo Domino ligio confitentes, culpam, offensam, injuriam, inobedientiam et reatum, tremulos et quasi cum lacrimis, presentavit ; reddens se eidem Regi ac voluntati ipsius, ac alios presentes, necnon omnes et singulos in castro morantes predicto, tanquam capitaneus eorundem ; necnon et ipsi presentes se ipsos sicut et alii cum gemitibus et suspiriis reddiderunt.’”

Capture of Wallace.

“A document recently discovered in the Chapter House, at Westminster, throws some light on this nefarious proceeding, and, by the high amount of the rewards given to the traitors, shows Edward's estimate of the prize which they had secured for him. Forty marks, equal to thirty pounds, were given to one person who had watched Wallace, probably the individual through whose aid he had been captured ; sixty marks (forty pounds) were given to others who had been employed in the same mission ; a like sum was divided among those who had been present at his capture ; and land to the value of one hundred pounds was assigned to Sir John Menteith. In estimating these sums with reference to the value of produce in our own day, we shall probably not overstate the amount thus distributed, if we consider it equivalent to £1,100 of ready money. This is exclusive of Sir John Menteith's share of the spoil, the amount of which it is not easy to reckon, since it was expended in land, at that time, of comparatively little value in the market.”—Introductory Notice to the Wallace Papers, p. 24.

This document corroborates the unvarying testimony of Scottish history and tradition, that Sir John Menteith was the person by whom Wallace was betrayed into the hands of the English. Lord Hailes, however, attempts to throw discredit on the statement that Menteith was the friend of Wallace, or “had ever any intercourse of friendship or familiarity with him.” But Bower expressly asserts that Menteith co-operated with Wallace, Graham, and Scrymgeour, in the suppression of the Galwegian insurgents. John Major, also, expressly affirms the treachery of Menteith as acting in concert with Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and says that Menteith was considered as the most intimate friend of Wallace.

Bower, who was born only about eighty years after the death of the Scottish patriot, asserts that Wallace, "suspecting no evil, was fraudulently and treacherously seized, at Glasgow, by Lord John de Menteith" (Scotichron, xii. p. 8); and he again refers to the treacherous conduct of Menteith towards Wallace, when afterwards relating a similar plot which he had laid for taking King Robert Bruce prisoner, under pretence of delivering up to him the Castle of Dunbarton (Book xxii. pp. 16, 17). Arnold Blair designates Menteith a monstrous traitor, and says, "Accursed be the day of his nativity, and may his name be struck out of the book of life." (See notes to Dr. Jamieson's edition of Blind Harry's Wallace.) It is generally said that Wallace was betrayed at a place called Rar-biston, or Robroyston, a few miles from Glasgow; and the tradition of the country bears, that the signal for rushing upon him and taking him at unawares was given by one of his pretended friends turning a bannock, or loaf, which was placed upon the table with its bottom or flat side uppermost. Hence, it was reckoned ill-breeding to turn a loaf in that manner if there was a person named Menteith in company, since it was virtually to remind him that his namesake had betrayed the great Scottish patriot. When the house in which Wallace was captured was taken down, about thirty years ago, the late Mr. Train purchased some butts of the oaken rafters, which were in a remarkable state of preservation, and caused to be made out of them an antique chair, curiously carved, which he presented to Sir Walter Scott, who attached a high value to the relic, and ultimately placed it in his own sanctum sanctorum. It is mentioned by Mr. Train "that reports of this chair spread over the adjacent country with a fiery-cross-like speed, and raised public curiosity to such a height, that persons in their own carriages came many miles to see it." The symbolic chair was borne in triumph from Mr. Train's lodgings to the bank of the Great Canal, there to be shipped for Abbotsford, in the midst of the town-band of Kirkintilloch playing "Scots wha hae wi' Wallace bled," and surrounded by thousands who made the welkin resound with bursts of national enthusiasm, justifying the couplet of Pope:—

"All this may be, the people's voice is odd;
The Scots will fight for Wallace as for God."

Et ex tunc omnia que poterat multitudine armatorum sibi et felonis suis adhaerentium abbas, vicus, civitates, et castra terras suas invasit, et brevia sua per totam Scotiam, tanquam brevia superioris filie terre, emanare fecit et demandavit, pariterque et congregationes suas, omnes prelatos et monachos predicti domini regis de terra Scotie per ipsum Willelmum dejectis, tenet et possidet, sine tanta nequitia et seditione valere possunt, omnibus omnibus prelatos, comites et barones terre sue parti sue adherentibus, quod felicitas et dominio regis Francie se subjugavit, et ad destructionem regni Anglie in auxilium venissent. Quosdam etiam de conspectibus suis terras tenentis, regnum Anglie, ut in comitatibus Northumberland, Comberland, et Westmorland, ingreditur, et omnes que abbas de felicitate regis Anglie invenit, diversis mortis gravibus abbas interfecit, viros religiosos et sanctos in domos, et ecclesias ad honorem Dei et servam sanctorum constructas, una cum corporibus sanctorum et alios reliquias eorum in eis honorifice custodias, abbas et seditione mactavit, non solum et demandavit, omnia qui lingua Anglica ulcatur possunt, ad manus senes cum juvenibus, spemque sua vobis, infantibus cum lactantibus, gravare morte sunt extinguere sciverat afflicto. Hinc de quibus dicitur et hinc in machinationem mortis ipsius domini regis et in coronam et regis majestatem sua consuetudinem et enervationem manducavit, seditionem et feloniam perpetravit. Et licet post sua venisset et honorifice facta predictus dominus rex non minus sua captivitate terram Scotie levavit, et predictus Willelmum vexillum contra eum in hunc tenentem deferentem et alios felones cum dicitur, tanquam pacem suam omnibus de terra sua consersisset, et prædictum Willelmum de Waleis ad pacem suam misericorditer revocari fecisset, idem Willelmus in sua prænotata nequitia seditiose et felonice concorditer et animose perseverans, paci prædicti domini regis se submittere et ad eam evenire contempsit, et sic in curia ipsius domini regis ut seductor, prædo et felo, secundum leges et consuetudines Angliæ et Scotiæ, publicè fuit utlagatus. Et injustum et legibus Anglicanis dissonum existat et creditur aliquem sic utlagatum et extra leges positum nec postea ad pacem ipsius restitutum, et defensionem status sui seu responsionem admitti. Consideratum est quod prædictus Willelmus pro manifesta seditione quam ipsi domino regi fecerat felonice machinando, in mortem ejus perpetrando, annulationem et enervationem coronæ et regiæ dignitatis suæ vexillum contra dominum suum ligium in bello mortali deferendo, detrahatur a palatio Westmonasterii usque Turrim Londoni, et a Turri usque Allegate, et sic per medium civitatis usque Elmes, et pro roberis et homicidiis et felonis, quas in regno Angliæ et terra Scotiæ fecit, ibidem suspendatur et postea devaleatur. Et quia utlagatus fuit, nec postea ad pacem domini regis restitutus, decolletur et decapitetur. Et postea pro immensa vilitate, quam Deo et sacrosanctæ ecclesiæ fecit comburendo ecclesias, vasa et feretra, in quibus corpus Christi et corpora sanctorum et reliquiæ eorundem collocabantur, cor, epar, et pulmo et omnia interiora ipsius Willelmi, a quibus tam perversæ cogitationes processerunt, in ignem mittantur et comburentur. Et etiam, quia non solum ipsi domino regi, sed toti plebi Angliæ et Scotiæ prædicta seditionem, deprædationes, incendia, et homicidia et felonias fecerat, corpus illius Willelmi in quatuor quarteria scindatur et dividatur, et caput sic abscissum assedatur super pontem Londoni, in conspectu tam per terram quam per aquam transeuntium, et unum quarterium suspendatur in gibetto apud Novum Castrum super Tynam, alium quarterium apud Berewyk, tertium quarterium apud Stryvelyn, et quartum quarterium apud Villam Sancti Johannis, in metum et castigationem omnium prætereuntium et ea conspicientium."

There exists, in the possession of H. P. Wallace, Esq., of Priory Lodge, near Cheltenham, a painting which has been considered by competent judges to be an original portrait of the Scottish hero. The following description of this valuable memorial, and sketch of its history, are given in a letter addressed by its present possessor to the secretary of the Maitland Club:—

"The portrait was procured in France by Margaret, Countess of Southesk, and by her presented to an ancestor of mine, Robert Wallace of Holmston, then Sheriff of Ayrshire."

"The above is the inscription on a brass plate. The picture is framed in the remains of the tree called Sir William Wallace's Oak, from the Torwood, Stirlingshire, cut from the stump in 1779, and given to my father by Sir James Dunbar of

'GVL · WALLAS · SCOTVS · HOST · IVML · TERROR.

Mr. Wallace of Kelly saw the picture in my house some time ago, and knew of nothing to compete with it in originality. It answers to the description of the patriot given by Blind Harry, who alludes to a picture painted of him in France; but into whose hands such a picture fell, is stated to be unknown."

Murder of Comyn.

It has been justly said by Sir Walter Scott, that "a homicide in such a place, and in such an age, could hardly escape embellishment from the fertile genius of the churchmen, whose interest was so closely connected with the inviolability of a divine sanctuary. Accordingly, Bowmaker informs us, that the body of the slaughtered baron was watched during the night by the Dominicans with the usual rites of the church. But, at midnight, the whole assistants fell into a dead sleep, with the exception of one aged father, who heard, with terror and surprise, a voice like that of a wailing infant exclaim, 'How long, O Lord, shall vengeance be deferred!' It was answered, in an awful tone, 'Endure with patience until the anniversary of this day shall return for the fifty-second time.' In the year 1357, fifty-two years after Comyn's death, James of Lindsay was hospitably feasted in the Castle of Caerlaveroc, in Dumfries-shire, belonging to Roger Kirkpatrick. They were the sons of the murderers of the Regent. In the dead of night, for some unknown cause, Lindsay arose, and poniarded in his bed his unsuspecting host. He then mounted his horse to fly; but guilt and fear had so bewildered his senses, that, after riding all night, he was taken at break of day not three miles from the castle, and was afterwards executed by order of King David II."

The story of the murder is thus told by the Prior of Lochleven:—

"That ilk yere in our kynryk

Wintoun's "Croneykill," book viii. cap. 44.

This incident forms the subject of the following interesting ballad, by the late Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Esq. :—

"Now, come to me, my little page,
Of wit sae wondrous sly;
Ne'er under flower o' youthfu' age
Did mair destruction lie.

"I'll dance and revel wi' the rest,
Within this castle rare;
Yet he shall rue the drearier feast,
Bot and his lady fair.

"For ye maun drug Kirkpatrick's wine
Wi' juice o' poppy flowers;
Nae mair he'll see the morning shine
Frae proud Caerlaveroc's towers.

"For he has twined my love and me,
The maid of mickle scorn—
She'll welcome, wi' a tearfu' ee,
Her widowhood the morn.

"And saddle weel my milk-white steed,
Prepare my harness bright;
Gif I can make my rival bleed,
I'll ride away this night."—

"Now, haste ye, master, to the ha'!
The guests are drinking there;
Kirkpatrick's pride sall be but sma',
For a' his lady fair."—

In came the merry minstrelsy;
Shrill harps wi' tinkling string,
And bagpipes, lilting melody,
Made proud Caerlaveroc ring.

There gallant knights, and ladies bright,
Did move to measures fine,
Like frolic fairies, jimp and light,
Wha dance in pale moonshine.

The ladies glided through the ha',
Wi' footing swift and sure—Kirkpatrick's dame outdid them a',
When she stood on the floor.

And some had tyres of gold so rare,
And pendants† eight or nine;
And she, wi' but her gowden hair,
Did a' the rest outshine.

And some wi' costly diamonds sheen
Did warriors' hearts assail—
But she, wi' her twa sparkling een, Pierced through the thickest mail.

Kirkpatrick led her by the hand,
With gay and courteous air;
No stately castle in the land
Could show so bright a pair.

O! he was young—and clear the day
Of life to youth appears!
Alas! how soon his setting ray
Was dimm'd wi' show'ring tears!

Fell Lindsay clink'd at the sight,
And sorrow grew his cheek;
He tried wi' smiles to hide his spite,
But word he cou'dna speak.

The gorgeous banquet was brought up,
On silver and on gold;
The page chose out a crystal cup,
The sleepy juice to hold.

And when Kirkpatrick call'd for wine,
This page the drink would bear;
Nor did the knight or dame divine
Sic black deceit was near.

Then every lady sang a sang—
Some gay—some sad and sweet—
Like tansie's birds the woods among,
Till a' began to greet.

E'en cruel Lindsay shed a tear, Forgetting malice deep—
As mermaids, wi' their warbles clear,
Can sing the waves to sleep.

And now to bed they all are gait,
Now steek they lika deer;
There's naught but stillness o' the night,
Whare was sic din before.

Fell Lindsay puts his harness on,
His steed doth ready stand;
And up the staircase he is gone,
Wi' pointair in his hand.

The sweat did on his forehead break,
He shook wi' giddy fear;
In air he heard a joyfu' shriek,
Red Cumins a' ghaist was near.

Now to the chamber doth he creep—
A lamp, of glimmering ray, Show'd young Kirkpatrick fast asleep,
In arms of lady gay.

He lay wi' bare, unguarded breast,
By sleepy juice beguiled,
And sometimes sigh'd, by dreams oppress'd,
And sometimes owensly smiled.

Unloos'd her mouth o' rowy hair,
Whence issued fragrant air,
That gently, in soft waves her Stray ringlets o'er her hair.

"Sleep on, sleep on, ye lovers dear!
The dame may wae to sleep—
But that day's sun maun be some cheer,
That spills this warrior's sleep."

He leuted down—her lips he press'd—
O! kin, forbidding ray!
Then struck on young Kirkpatrick's breast
A deep and deadly blow.

Sair, sair, and wailin' did he bind;
His lady slept till day,
But dreamt the Fook* loved o'er her head,
In bride-bed as she lay.

The murderer hasted down the stair,
And back'd his summer day,
Then did the thimble gie to air,
Then shower'd the rain and day.

† Pendants—jewels on the forehead.

As fire-flaught darted through the rain,
Whare a' was mirk before,
And glinted o'er the raging main,
That shook the sandy shore.

But mirk and mirker grew the night,
And heavier beat the rain;
And quicker Lindsay urged his flight,
Some ha' or beild to gain.

Lang did he ride o'er hill and dale,
Nor mire nor flood he fear'd:
I trow his courage 'gan to fail
When morning light appear'd.

For having hid the live-lang night,
Through hail and heavy showers,
He found himself, at peep o' light,
Hard by Caerlaveroc's towers.

The castle bell was ringing out,
The ha' was all asteer;
And mony a screech and waefu' shout
Appall'd the murderer's ear.

Now they hae bound this traitor strang,
Wi' curses and wi' blows,
And high in air they did him hang,
To feed the carrion crows.

“To sweet Lincluden's* haly cells
Fou dowie I'll repair;
There Peace wi' gentle Patience dwells,
Na deadly feuds are there.

“In tears I'll wither ilka charm,
Like draps o' balefu' yew;
And wail the beauty that cou'd harm
A knight sae brave and true.”

Capture and execution of Sir Simon Frazer, and other adherents of King Robert Bruce.

“The Friday next before the Assumption of our Lady, King Edward met Robert the Bruce at Saint Johnstoun, in Scotland, and with his company, of which company King Edward quelde seven thousand. When Robert the Bruce saw this mischief, and gan to flee, and hov'd him that men might not find him; but S. Simond Frisell (or Frazer) pursued so sore, so that he turned again and abode bataille, for he was a worthy knight and a bolde of bodey; and the Englishmen pursuede him sore on every side, and quelde the steed that Sir Simon Frisell rode upon, and then took him and led him to the host. And S. Simond began for to flatter and speke fair, and saide, Lordyes, I shall give you four thousand markes of silver, and myne horse and harness, and all my armour and income. Tho' answered Thobaude of Pevenes, that was the kinges archer, Now, God me so helpe, it is for nought that thou speakest, for all the gold of

And tho' he was led to the king, and the king would not see him, but commanded to lead him away to his doom in London, on Our Lady's even Nativity. And he was hung and drawn, and his head smitten off, and hanged again, with chains of iron, upon the gallows; and his head was set at London-bridge upon a spear, and against Christmas the body was burnt, for encheson (reason) that the men that kepted the body saw many devils ramping with iron hooks, running upon the gallows, and horribly tormenting the body. And many that them saw, anon thereafter died for dread, or waxen mad, or sore sickness they had.”—MS. Chronicle in the British Museum quoted by Ritson.

The following stanzas of a rude ballad of the times commemorate the fate of the gallant Sir Simon, spoken of in the preceding singular narrative, and give a minute account of the trial and barbarous execution of state criminals of that age. It was written immediately at the period, for it mentions the Earl of Athol as not yet in custody.

“This was before St. Bartholemew's mass,
That Frizel was y-taken, were it more other less,
To Sir Thomas of Multon, gentil baron and free,
And to Sir Johan Jose be-take tho was he
To hand

He was y-fettered wele,
Both with iron and with steel,
To bringen of Scotland.

“Soon thereafter the tiding to the king come,
He sent him to London, with mony armed groom,
He came in at Newgate, I tell you it on a-plight,
A garland of leaves on his head y-dight

Of green,
For he should be y-know,
Both of high and of low,
For traitour I ween.

“Y-fettered were his legs under his horse's wombe,
Both with iron and with steel mancler were his bond,
A garland of pervynk* set upon his heved,†
Much was the power that him was bereved,
In land.

So God me amend,
Little he ween'd
So to be brought in hand.

“This was upon our lady's even, forsooth I understand,
The justices sate for the knights of Scotland,
Sir Thomas of Multon, an kinde knyght and wise,
And Sir Ralph of Sandwich, that mickle is told in price,
And Sir Johan Abel;

Moe I might tell by tale,
Both of great and of small,
Ye know sooth well.

“Then said the justice, that gentil is and free,
Sir Simond Frizel, the king's traier hast thou be,
In water and in land, that mony mighten see,
What sayst thou thereto, how will thou quite thee,
Do say.

So foul he him wist,
Nede war on trust,
For to say nay.

NOTE J (VII.), p. 120.

We are told by Barbour, that when King Robert Bruce was about to pass over from Arran to the Scottish mainland, to make a final effort to regain his lost kingdom, he was met by a Highland prophetess, who not only predicted his good fortune, but sent her two sons along with him to ensure her own family a share in it.

" Then in time men might them see Schute all their galleys to the sea,
And bear to sea baith ayr and ster,
And other things that mystir ¶ were;

Barbour's "Bruce," book iii. 206—207.

The reader may compare with the above, the prediction which the Great Northern Marston pass into the mouth of the Abbot, in the Lord of the Isles :—

" Like man by poudry amazd,
Upon the King the Abbot gaud,
Then o'er his pallid features glauc
Convulsions of convulsive trances.
His breathing came more thick and fast,
And from his pale blue eyes were cast
Strange rays of wild and wandering light;
Uprize his locks of silver white,
Flush'd is his brow, through every vein
In azure tide the currents strain,
And undistinguish'd accents broke
The awful silence ere he spak.

" De Bruce! I rose with purpos dread,
To speak my curse upon thy head,
And give thee no an extract o'er
To him who burns to shed thy gore;
But, like the Midwives of old,
Who stood on Zephira, harr-ra-ur-rur'd,
I feel within mine aged breast
A power that will not be repress'd;
It prompts my voice, it swells my veins,
It burns, it maddens, it convulses—
De Bruce, thy marvellous view
Hath at God's altar slain the sin
O'ermeator'd yet by high behoud,
I bless thee, and thou shalt be bless'd!
He spak, and o'er the abbot's throng
Was silence awfal, deep, and long.

" Again that light has shed his ray,
Again his form exalts bold and bright,
The broken voice of age is gone,
The vigorous manhood's life is seen,
'Thrice vanquish'd on the battle-field,
Thy followers slaughter'd, dead, or slain,
A hunted wanderer on the west,
On foreign shores a man still'd.

• Suffer.

† King.

Disown'd, deserted, and distress'd,
 I bless thee, and thou shalt be bless'd!
 Bless'd in the hall and in the field,
 Under the mantle as the shield.
 Avenger of thy country's shame,
 Restorer of her injured fame,
 Bless'd in thy sceptre and thy sword,
 De Bruce, fair Scotland's rightful lord,
 Bless'd in thy deeds and in thy fame,
 What lengthen'd honours wait thy name!
 In distant ages, sire to son Shall tell thy tale of freedom won.
 And teach his infants, in the use
 Of earliest speech, to falter Bruce.
 Go, then, triumphant! sweep along Thy course, the theme of many a song!
 The Power, whose dictates swell my breast,
 Hath bless'd thee, and thou shalt be bless'd!"

The signal fire near Turnberry Castle.

The following is the account given by Barbour of the manner in which this fire was kindled:—

"They rowed fast, with all their mycht,
 Till that upon them fell the night,
 That woux mirk* upon great manner,
 Sa that they wist nocht where they were,
 For they nae needill had, nae stane;
 But rowed always in till ane,
 Steering all tyme upon the fire,
 That they saw brynnand† lycht and schyr.‡
 It was but aventure§ them led,
 And they in short time sae them sped
 That at the fire arriv'd they,
 And went to land but|| mair delay.
 And Cuthbert, that has seen the fire,
 Was full of anger, and of ire:
 For he durst nocht do it away;
 And was also dowaund aye
 That his lord suld pass to see,
 Therefore their coming waitit he,
 And met them at their arriving.
 He was weel soon brought to the king,
 That speerit at him how he had done,
 And he with sair heart tauld him soon,
 How that he fand nane weel luffand,¶
 But all were faes, that he fand:
 And that the lord the Percy,
 With near three hunder in company,
 Was in the castle there beside,
 Fullfilled of dispite and pride,
 But mair than twa pairs of his rout Were herbored in the toune without;
 'And dispitit you mair, Sir King,
 Than men may dispit ony thing.'
 Then said the king, in full great ire,
 'Traitor, why made thou then the fire?'
 'Ah, Sire,' said he, 'sa GOD me see!
 The fire was never made for me;
 Na, or the nicht, I wist it nocht;
 But frae I wist it, weel I thoct,
 That ye, and haly your menyne,

 To tell perils that may appear.
 The king was of his speik angry,
 And askit his pryve men, in hy,
 What at them thoct was best to do.
 Sir Edward first answered thercto,
 His brother that was sae hardy,
 And said, 'I say you sickerly
 There sall nae peril, that may be,
 Drive me eftsonys* to the sea,
 Mine aventure here take will I,
 Whether it be esfull or angry.'
 'Brother,' he said, 'sen thou will sa,
 It is gude that we samyn ta,
 Dissese or ease, or pain or play
 Eftyr as GOD will us purway.†
 And sen men sayis that the Percy Mine heritage will occupy;
 And his men sae near us lyeis,
 That us dispytis mony wyss;

 And tho we sleeping slew them all,

 For werrayour nae force suld ma,

 But that gude faith aye holdyn be.'"

Barbour's "Bruce," book iv. 50.

The same incident is described by Sir Walter Scott in the following spirited lines:—

"In night the fairy prospects sink,
 Where Cumray's isles with verdant link
 Close the fair entrance of the Clyde;
 The woods of Bute, no more desried,
 Are gone—and on the placid sea
 The rovers ply their task with glee,
 While hands that knightly lances bore Impatient aid the labouring oar.
 The half-faced moon shone dim and pale,
 And glanced against the whitened sail;
 But on that ruddy beacon-light
 Each steersman kept the helm aright,
 And oft, for such the king's command,
 That all at once might reach the strand,
 From boat to boat loud shout and hail Warned them to crowd or slacken sail.
 South and by west the armada bore,
 And near at length the Carrick shore,
 As less and less the distance grows,
 High and more high the beacon rose;
 The light, that seem'd a twinkling star,
 Now blazed portentous, fierce, and far.
 Dark-red the sea beneath it flow'd,
 Dark-red the heaven above it glow'd,
 Red rose the rocks on ocean's brim,
 In blood-red light her islets swim;
 Wild scream the dazzled sea-fowl gave,
 Dropp'd from their crags on plashing wave,
 The deer to distant covert drew,
 The blackcock deem'd it day, and crew;

* Soon after. † Prepare.
 ‡ Avenge. § Quickly.
 || Confidently.

Like some tall castle given to flame,
O'er half the land the lustre came.

With that the boats approach'd the land,
But Edward's grounded on the sand;
The eager knight leaped in the sea
Waist-deep, and first on shore was he,
Though every barge's hardy band
Contended which should gain the land,
When that strange light, which, seen afar,
Seem'd steady as the polar star,
Now, like a prophet's fiery chair,
Seem'd travelling the realms of air,
Wide o'er the sky the splendour glows,
As that portentous meteor rose;
Helm, axe, and falchion glitter'd bright,
And in the red and dusky light
His comrade's face each warrior saw,
Nor marvell'd it was pale with awe.
Then high in air the beams were lost,
And darkness sunk upon the coast."

The late Mr. Joseph Train says, "The only tradition now remembered of the landing of Robert Bruce in Carrick, relates to the fire seen by him from the Isle of Arran. It is still generally reputed, and religiously believed by many, that this fire was really the work of supernatural power, unassisted by the hand of any mortal being: and it is said that, for several centuries, the flame rose yearly on the same hour of the same night of the year on which the king first saw it from the turrets of Brodick Castle, and some go so far as to say, that if the exact time were known, it would be still seen. That this superstitious notion is very ancient, is evident from the place where the fire is said to have appeared being called the Bogles Brae beyond the remembrance of man."

"Now, ask you whence that wondrous light,
Whose fairy glow beguiled their sight?
It ne'er was known—yet grey-haired eld
A superstitious credence held,
That never did a mortal hand
Wake its broad glare on Carrick strand;
Nay, and that on the self-same night
When Bruce cross'd o'er, still gleams the light.
Yearly it gleams o'er mount and moor,
And glittering wave and crimson'd shore—
But whether beam celestial, lent
By heaven to aid the king's descent,
Or fire hell-kindled from beneath,
To lure him to defeat and death,
Or were it but some meteor strange,
Of such as oft through midnight range,
Startling the traveller late and lone,
I know not, and it ne'er was known."

NOTE L (IX.), p. 133.

Position of the Scottish army at Bannockburn.

According to the account which Barbour gives of the arrangements made by King Robert Bruce, the Scottish line must have extended in a north-eastly direction from the brook of Bannock to the village of St. Ninian's. (See plan of Bannockburn and the surrounding country.) Buchanan, however, affirms that the Scots were drawn up east and west, and facing the southward. This opinion has been adopted by Mr. Nimmo, the author of the History of Stirlingshire, and more recently by Mr. Tytler, who, in a plan of the battle given in his history, represents the Scottish army as drawn up on the small piece of level ground between Hallow Marsh and Milton Marsh, immediately to the south of the Bannock Burn. The objections to this view, however, appear to be unanswerable. 1. If the Scots had been placed in this position, there was nothing to have prevented the English approaching upon the cause or level ground from Falkirk, either from turning the Scottish left flank, or from passing their position if they preferred it without coming to an action, and moving on to the relief of Stirling. 2. On the evening before the battle eight hundred horsemen, commanded by Sir Robert Clifford, were detached from the English army, for the purpose of throwing sarrows into the Castle of Stirling. This manoeuvre was directed by King Robert Bruce himself, who called the attention of Randolph to the movement; and he, at the head of five hundred spearmen, intercepted and defeated the English cavalry. But if the Scottish army had been drawn up in the line of the brook of Bannock, it was impossible, owing to the configuration of the ground, that Bruce could have seen Clifford's horsemen on their march, as Barbour expressly mentions that they avoided the New Park, where Bruce's army lay, and held "well south the kirk," viz., of St. Ninian's, and it was equally impossible that Randolph's infantry, which on the hypothesis in question was drawn up beside Milton Park, moving from that position with whatever velocity, could cut off from Stirling a body of cavalry who had already passed St. Ninian's, or in other words, were already between them and the town, whom, supposing Randolph's left to have approached St. Ninian's, the short movement to Newhouse would easily be executed, so as to intercept the English in the manner described. 3. Barbour assumes that the garrison of Stirling, upon the evening before the battle, rendered some secret assistance to their countrymen in placing temporary bridges of doors and spars over the pools of water in the cause, to enable them to advance to the charge, and this assistance could not have been rendered had not the English approached from the southwest, since had their march been due north the whole Scottish army must have been between them and the garrison. 4. Multitudes of the English fugitives were drowned in attempting to escape across the river Forth, and many of them took refuge in the recesses on which Stirling Castle is built, and King Edward himself fed in this direction, and demanded admission into the castle, which could not have taken place if the Scots had been drawn up facing the south, as in that case the fugitives must have penetrated through the victorious army to reach the Forth or Stirling Castle. 5. The Gillies' Hill, if this hypothesis be adopted, would be situated not in the rear, as allowed by all the historians, but upon the left flank of Bruce's army. (See Hailes' Annals, vol. ii. p. 54; Appendix to Sir Walter Scott's Lord of the Isles, Note V.; Barbour's Bruce, Book viii. and ix.)

The following list of the slain at Bannockburn, extracted from the continuation of Trivet's Annals, will show the extent of the loss suffered by the English in this disastrous conflict:—

Bruce's Testament.

The leonine verses called Bruce's Testament are as follows:—

"Scotica sit guerre pedites, mons, mossica terra, Silva pro muris sint, arcus et hasta, securis,
Per loca stricta greges munierunt. Plana per ignes
Sic inflammantur, ut ab hostibus evacuantur.
Insidia vigiles sint, noctu vociferantur.
Sic male turbati redient velut ense fugati Hostes pro certo, Sic Rege docente Roberto."

These verses are thus rendered in Hearne:—

"On foot should be all Scottish weire,
By hill and moss themselves to bear:
Let wood for walls be—bow and spear,
And battle-axe their fighting gear:
That enemies do them no dear,*
In strait place cause keep all store,
And burn the plain land them before;
Then shall they pass away in haste,
When that they nothing find but waste;
With wiles and wakening of the night,
And mickle noises made on height;
Then shall they turn with great array,
As they were chased with sword away,
This is the council and intent
Of good King Robert's testament."

NOTE N, p. 185.

Death of Randolph.

Barbour, the metrical historian of Bruce, whose work is of the highest authority, informs us that Randolph was poisoned, without adding any particulars:—

"The lave sa weill mantenynt he,
And held in pess swa the cowntre,
That it was nevir or his day
Sa weill, as I herd auld men say.
But syne, allace! pusionyt wes he;
To see his dede was gret pite."—Barbour, p. 423.

Barbour is generally believed to have been born about 1316, and, according to Lord Hailes' conjecture, was fifteen years old at the period of the death of Randolph. On what grounds are we entitled to set aside such an authority?

Winton is supposed, by his able editor, Macpherson, to have been born about the year 1350 (Preface to Winton's Chronicle, p. 19), only eighteen years after the death of Randolph. He composed his chronicle in his old age, having commenced it in 1420, and finished it in 1424. (Ibid. p. 22.) His account is as follows:—

"Therefore with slycht thai thoct to gere
Him wyth wenenous fell poysonw
Be destroyid, and fel tresown,
And that thai browcht swin til endyng
Be swin tresownabil wundertakyng;
For at the Wemyss, by the se,
Poysonynd at a feast wes he."—Vol. ii. p. 146.

This is clear and direct testimony also. Let us next turn, not to Fordun, for he omits all mention of the circumstance of the poisoning, and simply states the death of the Regent, but to his continuator, Bower, who, as we learn from himself, was born fifty-three years after the death of Randolph, in the year 1385. "Et ideo," says he, speaking of the designs of the disinherited barons against Randolph, "novam artem confixerunt, et ut Italici ferunt, bello tradimento verius vili effecerunt, ut quidam Anglicus religione corruptus dicto custodi familiaris capellanus, sibi venenum in vino propinaret. Quod et factum est ut supra."—Tytler, Appendix to vol. ii., Letter B.

* Harm.

Death of the Earl of Douglas at Otterburn.

According to one version of the ballad on the Battle of Otterburn, Douglas was assassinated by his page, a story which Godscroft states was not without some foundation in tradition. "There are that say, that he (Douglas) was not slain by the enemy, but by one of his own men, a groom of his chamber, whom he had struck the day before with a truncheon, in ordering of the battle, because he saw him make somewhat slowly to. And they name this man John Bickerton of Luffness, who left a part of his armour behind unfastened, and when he was in the greatest conflict, this servant of his came behind his back, and slew him thereat." "But this narration," adds the historian, "is not so probable." §§ "Indeed," says Sir Walter Scott,

* Lord Hailes is of opinion that this is William Douglas, the bastard brother of William Douglas of Liddesdale.

† Of Montrose; ancestor of the Duke of Montrose.

‡ Predecessor of the Lords Haliburton of Dirleton.

§ Made prisoner by Ralph de Hastings. Hastings died of his wounds. He bequeathed the body of Roger de Kirkpatrick to his joint legatees, Edmund Hastings of Kynthorpe, and John de Kirkeby.

|| Of Caerlaverock, ancestor of the Earl of Nithsdale.

‖ Ancestor of the Earl of Marchmont.

 Supposed to have been the ancestor of Preston Lord Dingwall.

†† Probably Sir William Ramsay of Colluthy. He was at the battle of Poitiers, in 1356, and was made prisoner there.

‡‡ Of Dalswinton, as the record bears. Ancestor of the Earl of Galloway.

"The Erle Jamys was sa besy,
For til ordane his company,
And on his fays for to pas,
That reckles he of his armyng was;
The Erle of Murrays bassenet,
Thai sayd, at thot tyme was ferry hete"
Book viii. e. vii.

The circumstance of Douglas omitting to put on his helmet occurs in the ballad of the Battle of Otterburn:—

"He belted on his guid braid sword,
And to the field he ran;
But he forgot the helmet good,
That should have kept his brain."

"it seems to have no foundation, but the genuine desire of assigning some remote and extraordinary cause for the death of a great man."

Death of David Duke of Rothesay.

"Robertus, Dei gratia, Rex Scottorum, universis, ad quorum notitiam presentes littere pervenerint, salutem in Domino sempiternam. Cum super carissimis nobis, Robertus Albanus Rex, Comes de Fife et de Menteth, frater noster germanus, et Archibaldus, Comes de Douglas, et Iacobus Oldwidie, filius noster secundum legem, contra Regem nostrum quam duxit in nostram, presentiumque filium nostrum primogenitum David, quondam Ducem Rothesaye, ac Comitem de Carrick et Athollim, capi fecerunt, et personaliter arreperunt, et in Castro Sancto Andrew, primo castro, deinde apud Faucland in custodia detinuit, ubi ab hac luce, divina providentia, et non aliter, magnum dignoscitur. Datum, sub testimonio magni sigilli nostri, in monasterio Sanctæ Crucis de Edinburgh, vicesimo die mensis Maii prædicti, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo secundo, et regni nostri anno tertio decimo."

"From this instrument, the following circumstances may be collected:—

"1. The death of David, Prince of Scotland, occasioned a parliamentary inquiry.

"2. His uncle, Robert, Duke of Albany, and his brother-in-law, Archibald, Earl of Douglas, were, at least, suspected of having confined him and put him to death.

"3. The result of the inquiry was, that the Duke of Albany and the Earl of Douglas avowed that they had confined him, and justified their conduct from motives of public utility.

"4. The king did not hold it as expedient or necessary to publish their motives to the world.

"5. It appeared that the Prince of Scotland 'departed this life, through Divine Providence, and not otherwise.' The reader will determine as to the import of this phrase. If by it a natural death was intended, the circumlocution seems strange and affected.

"6. The Duke of Albany and the Earl of Douglas obtained a remission in terms as ample as if they had actually murdered the heir-apparent."—Hailes' Annals, vol. iii. p. 57.

NOTE S, p. 253.

The Battle of Harlaw.

Frae Dunidier as I came through,
Doun by the hill of Bannochie, Alangst the lands of Garioch,
Grit pitie was to heir and see
The noise and dulesome harmonic,
(That evir that dulefu' day did daw!)
Cryand the coranach on bie, Alas, alas for the Harlaw!

I marvelit what the matter meint;
All folks were in a ferie fairrie;
I wist not wha was fae or friend;
Yet quietly I did me carrie.
But, sin the days of auld King Harrie,
Sic slauchter was not heard nor seen;
And there I had not time to tarrie,
For business in Abirdene.

Thus as I walkit on the way,
To Inverury as I went,
I met a man and bade him stay,
Requisting him to mak me 'quaint

Of the beginning and the event,
That happenit there at the Harlaw:
Then he entreit me tak tent,
And he the truth sould to me shaw.

"Grit Donald of the Isles did claim Unto the lands of Ross some richt,
And to the governor he came Them for to have, gif that he might;
Wha saw his interest was but slicht,
And therefore answerit with disdain.
He haisit hame baith day and nicht,
And sent nae bodward* back again.

"But Donald, richt impatient
Of that answer Duke Robert gave,
He vowed to God omnipotent
All the hale lands of Ross to have,
Or else be graithit † in his grave.
He wald nocht quat his richt for nocht,
Nor be abaisit like a slave.
That bargain sould be deirly boucht.

"Then hastilie he did command
That all his weir-men ‡ sould convene,
Ilk ane weil-harnessit frae hand, §
To meit and heir what he did mein.
He waxit wroth and vowit tein, ||
Sweirand he wald surprise the North,
Subdue the bruch of Abirdene, Mearns, Angus, and all Fife to Forth.

"Thus, with the weir-men of the Isles,
Wha war aye at his biddin boun';
With monie mae, with fors and wyles,
Richt far and neir, baith up and douu,
Through mount and muir, frae toun to toun,
Alangs the lands of Ross, he roars;
And all obeyed at his bandoun, ¶
Evin frae the north to suthren shores.

"Then all the countrie-men did yield,
For nae resistance durst they mak,
Nor offer battle in the field,
Be fors of arms to beir him back.
But they resolvit all, and spak,
That best it was for their behuve,
They sould him for their chieftain tak,
Believing weel he did them luve.

"Then he a proclamation made,
All men to meit at Inverness
Through Murray land to make a raid, Frae Arthursye unto Speyness.
And, furthermair, he sent expresse,
To shaw his colours and ensenyie,
To all and sundrie, mair or less,
Throughout the bounds of Boyne and Enyie.

"And then through fair Strabogie land
His purpose was for to pursue,
And whasoev' durst gainstaind,
That race they should full sairly rue.
Then he bade all his men be true,
And him defend by fors and slicht,
And promist them rewards enew,
To mak them men of mickle might.

 Inroad.

- " Without resistans, as he said,
Through all these bounds he stoutly past,
Where some war wac, and some war glad;
But Garioch was all aghast!
Through all these fields he sped him fast,
For sic a sicht was never sene;
And then, forsooth, he launged at last
To see the bruch of Abirdene.
- " To hinder this proud enterpyse,
The stout and michtie Earl of Mar,
With all his men in arms, did ryse,
Even frae Crugarf to Craigievar,
And down the syde of Dou richt far.
Angus and Mearns did a' convene,
To fecht, orr Donald cam sas nar
The royal bruch of Abirdene.
- " And thus the martial Earl of Mar
Marcht with his men in richt array;
Befoir the enemy was nar,
His banner bauldly did display.
For weel enouch they kened the way,
And all their semblance weil they saw,
Without all danger or delay,
Come hastilie to the Harlaw.
- " With him the braif Lord Ogilvie,
Of Angus sherif-principal,
The constable of gude Dundie,
The vanguard led befor them all.
Suppose in number they war small,
They first richt baulddie did pursue,
And made their foes befor them fall,
Wha then that race did sairly rue.
- " And then the worthy Lord Saltone,
The strong, undoubted Laird of Drum,
The stalwart Laird of Lauristone,
With ilk their forces all and some;
Panmure, with all his men, did come;
The provost of braif Abirdene,
With trumpetis and with tuik of drum.
Came shortlie in their armour sheen.
- " These with the Earl of Mar came on,
In the reirward richt orderlie,
Their enemies to set upon,
In awful manner, hardlie;
Together vowit to live and die,
Since they had marchit monie myles,
For to suppress the tyrannie
Of doubted Donald of the Isles.
- " But he in number ten to ane
Richt subtilie along did ryde,
With Malcolmsh and fell Maclean,
With all their power at their syde.
Presumand on their strength and pryde,
Without all feir or ony awe,
Richt baulddie battle did abyde,
Hard by the toun of fair Harlaw.
- " The armies met, the trumpet sounds,
The dandering* drums aloud did tuik, Baith armyes bydand on the bounds,

- " With doubtlesse valour they docht,
The bluddy battle bauld lang;
Ilk man his neebor's force than docht;
The weakest aft thame got the wrong;
There was nae movie* there thame coming;
Nothing was heard but heavy thumκ;
The echo made a dubly† canκ, Thereto resounding frae the rocks.
- " But Donald's men at last gaid back,
For they were all out of array;
The Earl of Mar's men through them past,
Pursuing sherples in their way,
Their enemies to tak or slay.
By dint of force to gar them yield,
Wha war richt bythe to win cover,
And nae for fright they tint the field.
- " Then Donald fled, and that full fast
To mountains high, for all his might;
For he and his men ever all aghast,
And ran till they were out of sight,
And one of Ross he lost his sight.
Though mony men he with him brackt,
Towards the Yles fled day and night,
And all he won was deltry brackt.
- " This is," quod he, " the richt report
Of all that I did heir and see,
Though my discourse be somewhat short,
Tak this to be a richt gude aw; † Contrair to God and the King's law,
There was spilt muckle Christian blood

With all their gunnes and relief
War dulefully hangy in the field;
And now we are freed of their field;
They will not lang to come again;

"The exact age of the above historical song or poem has not been ascertained, and has given rise to some discussion. Lord Hailes suspected, 'that it will be found to be as recent as the days of Queen Mary or James VI.' Mr. Sibbald concurs in this opinion; but, on the other hand, Mr. Ritson, Mr. Pinkerton, and Mr. Finlay, maintain that, 'from its manner, it might have been written soon after the event.' That this poem is of considerable antiquity cannot be doubted, the 'battle of Haylaw' being named amongst the popular songs of the time by the author of the Complaynt of Scotland, 1549; and it may be considered as the original of rather a numerous class of our historical ballads. No copy of an earlier date than that in Ramsay's Evergreen, 1724, is known; but it certainly had been printed long before his time. An edition, printed in the year 1668, was in the curious library of old Robert Myln."—Laing's Early Metrical Tales, Preface VII.

In the manuscript geographical description of Scotland, collected by Macfarlane, and preserved in the Advocates' Library, vol. i. p. 7, there is the following minute description of the site of this battle:—"Through this parish (the chapel of Garioch, called formerly Capella Beate Mariæ Virginie de Garryoch, Chart. Aberdon, p. 31) runs the king's highway from Aberdeen to Inverness, and from Aberdeen to the high country. A large milc to the east of the church lies the field of an ancient battle, called the Battle of Harlaw, from a country town of that name hard by. This town and the field of battle, which lies along the king's highway upon a moor extending a short mile from SE. NW., stands on the north-east side of the water of Urie, and a small distance therefrom. To the west of the field of battle, about half a mile, is a farmer's house, called Legget's Den, hard by in which is a tomb, built in the form of a malt-steep, of four large stones, covered with a broad stone above, where, as the country-people generally report, Donald of the Isles lies buried, being slain in the battle, and therefore they call it commonly Donald's tomb." So far the MS. It is certain, however, that the Lord of the Isles was not slain. This may probably be the tomb of the chief of Maclean, or of Macintosh, both of whom fell in the battle. In the genealogical collections of the same industrious antiquary (MS. Advocates' Library, Jac. V. 4, 16, vol. i. p. 180), we find a manuscript account of the family of Maclean, which informs us that Lauchlan Lubanich had by McDonald's daughter a son, called Eachin Rusidh ni Cath, or Hector Rufus Bellicosus. He commanded as lieutenant-general under the Earl of Ross at the Battle of Harlaw, in 1411, where he and Irving of Drum, seeking out one another by their armorial bearings on their shields, met and killed each other. He was married to a daughter of the Earl of Douglas.

"Sir Walter Ogilvy, on the 28th of January, 1426, founded a chaplainry in the parish church of St. Mary of Uchterhouse, in which perpetual prayers were to be offered up for the salvation of King James and his Queen Johanna; and for the souls of all who died in the Battle of Harlaw."—*Diplom. Annual Revenues of the Hostages for James I.

The following list of the names of the hostages of James I. is not a little curious, as there is added to the name of each baron a statement of his yearly income, presenting us with an interesting picture of the comparative wealth of the members of the Scottish aristocracy in 1423:—

David, eldest son and heir of the Earl of Atholl, returned at twelve hundred marks.

Thomas, Earl of Moray, at 1000 marks.

Alexander, Earl of Crawford, at 1000 marks.

Duncan, Lord of Argyll, at 1500 marks.

William, eldest son and heir of Lord Dalkeith, at 1500 marks.

State of Scotland in the fourteenth century.

Account given by Thomas Eyvins, afterwards Pope Pius II. —

"Concerning Scotland he found those things worthy of repetition. It is an island joined to England, stretching two hundred miles to the north, and about fifty broad; a cold country, fertile of few sorts of grain, and generally void of trees, but there is a wilderness of stone slag up which is used for firing. The towns are walled, the houses commonly built without lines, and the villages roofed with turf, while a cow's tail supplies the place of a door. The country is poor and uneducated, have abundance of beef, and fish, but eat bread as a delicacy. The men are small in stature, but bold; the women shy and scanty, and prone to the phrensies of love, being there esteemed of less consequence than young the hand in Italy. The wine is all imported, the horses are mostly small working nags, only a few being preserved entire for propagation, and wooden curry-combs nor reins are used. The oxen are larger than in England. From Flanders are imported into Flanders tables, made with fish, and pearls. Nothing gives the Scots more pleasure than to hear the English dispraised. The country is divided into two parts, the cultivated lowlands, and the region where agriculture is not used. The wild Scots have a different language, and sometimes eat the bark of trees. There are no wolves. Crows are new inhabitants, and therefore the tree in which they build becomes royal property.' At the winter solstice, when the author was there, the day did not exceed four hours. In another place, Silvio observes, 'That the fabulous tale of the bar-nacles, the invention of dreaming monks, had passed from Scotland to the Orkneys: and that coals were given to the poor at the church doors, by way of alms, the country being denuded of wood.'

The author adds a naïf account of his adventures in the north of England on his return. He went disguised as a merchant, and on passing the Tweed, could get neither wine nor bread. An alarm was spread in the night that the Scottish borderers were approaching, and the men fled, but the women refused: "nihil enim his mali facturos hostes credunt, qui stuprum inter mala non ducunt."—Pinkerton, vol. i. p. 150.

Romance of Feranbrace, or Fierabras.

The romance, which the venerable biographer of Bruce represents that "gude King" as reading or reciting to his followers on the shores of Loch Lomond, is evidently the French romance of Fierabras. The late Dr. Farmer had in his possession a copy of this romance in MS., from which Mr. Ellis has given some extracts in his Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances, vol. ii. p. 356. The English work is professedly translated from the French; but the copy used by Bruce must have been different, and an earlier translation than that quoted by Mr. Ellis in his abstract of the story. "The original," Mr. Ellis says, "may possibly be the Fierabras of which there is a copy in Bibl. Reg. 15, E. vi."

"Fer-à-bras," say the authors of the Dict. de Trevoux, "ou Bras-de-fer, est un surnom pris par quelques grands seigneurs qui avoient signalé leur courage, et fait sentir la force de leur bras dans les batailles. Badouin, Bras-de-fer, est regardé comme le premier Comte de Flandres. Quelques auteurs l'appellent Fer-à-bras. Hues Chapel n'étoit pas seulement fort-à-tête, mais grand Fer-à-bras. Guillaume, frere de Robert, Guiscard, porta le surnom de Fer-à-bras à cause de sa valeur."—Notes to Jamieson's Edition of Barbour's "Bruce," pp. 433, 436.

Execution of the Douglases.

"The Douglases, along with their unfortunate friend and adherent Malcolm Fleming, were beheaded, according to Gray's MS., "in vigilio Sancte Katerine Virginis, viz. xxiii. die mensis Novembris, anno Domini 1^{mo} III^o XL." The date in the Extracta ex Veteribus Chronicis Scotiæ agrees with this; but it appears, from the following curious instrument, that Malcolm Fleming was executed, not at the same time as the Douglases, but on the fourth day thereafter:—In Dei nomine, Amen. Per hoc presens publicum instrumentum cunctis pateat evidenter quod anno ab incarnatione Domini, secundum computationem Regni Socie M^{mo} CCCC^{mo} XL^{mo} mensis Januarii die vii. Indictione quarta Pontificatus Sanctissime in Xpo patris et Domini nostri, Domini Eugenii divina providentia Popæ Quarti, Anno X^{mo}. In mei Notarii publici et testium subscriptorum presencia personaliter constitut Nobiles viri Walterus de Buchwhanane et Thomas de Murhede scutiferi, ac procuratores nobilis viri Roberti Flemyng scutiferi, filii et heredis Malcolmi Flemyng quondam Domini de Bigar, habentes ad infrascripta potestaten et sufficiens mandatum, ut incipso notario constabat per legitima documenta, accedentes ad Crucem fori Burgi de Lithgow, coram Willmo de Howstoun deputato Vicecomitis ejusdem, procuratorio nomine dieti Roberti, falsaverunt quoddam judicium datum seu prelatum super Malcolmum Flemyng, patrem dieti Roberti, super montem Castri de Edynburch, Secundum modum et formam, et propter rationem inferius scriptum, quarum tenor sequitur in vulgar.

"We, Walter of Buchquanane and Thomas of Murhede, speciale procurators and actournais, conjunctly and severally, to Robert Flemyng, son and ayr to Malcolm Flemyng, sumtyme Lord of Bigar, sayis to thee, John of Blayr Dempstar, that the doyme gyffin out of thy mouth on Malcolm Flemyng, in a said Courte haldyn befor our soverane lord 7^e king, on the Castle-hill of Edynburch, on Mononday, the acht and twenty day of the moneth of November, the yere of our Lord M^{mo} CCCC^{mo} and fourty yeris. Sayande, 'that he had forfat land, lyff, and gude as chete to the king, and that you gave for doyme;' that doyme forsaid giffyn out of thy mouth is evyl, fals, and rotten in itself; and here we, the forsaid Walter and Thomas, procurators to the said Robert for hym, and in his name, fals it, adnull it, and again cancel it in thy hand, William of Howstoun, deput to the sherray of Lithgow, and tharto a borch in thy hand; and for this cause the courte was unlachfull, the doyme unlachfull, unorderly gyffin, and agane our statut; for had he been a common thef takyn redhand haldyn twa sons, he sulde haff had his law dayis he askande them, as he did before our soverane lord the king; and be this resoune the doyme is evyll giffyn and weill again said, and her we, the foresaid Walter and Thomas, procurators to the foresaid Robert, protests for ma resounys to be giffyn up be the said Robert, or be his procurators qwhar he acht, in lawfull tyme.

"Dictum judicium sic ut premittitur falsatum et adnullatum dicti procuratoris, nomine dicti Roberti, invenerunt plegium ad prosequendum dictas adnullaciones et falsaciones predicti judicii, in manu

Roberti Nicholson, serjandi domini nostri regis, qui dictum plegium recepit. Postmodo vero dicti procuratores offerebant falsacionem adnullacionem diete judicii sub sigillo prefati Roberti Flemyng dicto Willelmo de Howstoun deputato dieti vicomitis, qui recipere recusavit, dicendo quod recepo ejusdem pertinebat ad justiciarium et non ad vicecomitum, et tunc ipsi procuratores continuo publice protestati sunt, quod dieta recusacio nullum prejudicium dicto Roberto Flemyng generaret in futurum. Super quibus omnibus et singulis prefati Walterus et Thomas procuratorio nomine ut supra a me notario publico infrascript sibi fieri peecerunt publicum instrumentum, seu publica instrumenta.

“Acta fuerunt hæc apud cruceem ville de Lithgw, hora qui decima ante meridiem anno, die, mense, Indiceione et Pontificatu quibus supra, presentibus ibidem providis viris, Willelmo de Houston, deputato ut supra, Domino Willmollane, Domino Johanne person presbyteris, Jacobo Fowlys, publico notario eum multis aliis testibus, ad premissa vocatis specialiter et rogatis.”

This instrument, which exhibits in a striking light the formal solemnity of feudal manners, is printed from a copy communicated to Mr. Tytler by Thomas Thomson, Esq., Depute-clerk Register, and taken from the original, in the archives of the earldom of Wigtown, preserved in the charter-chest at Cumbernauld.—Tytler, Appendix to vol. iv.

NOTE BB, p. 407.

"Gazette of the Battle of Flodden, Sept. 1513. MS. Herald's College, London, marked 2d. M 16.

"Articles envouez aux Maistres des Postes du Roy d'Angleterre, par son serviteur, de la fourme et maniere de bataille, d'entre le Roy d'Escosse et Monar le Conte de Surrey, lieutenant dud. s^r Roy d'Angleterre, a Brankston le ixt jour de Septembre, le quel serviteur estoit a la d^e bataille.

"Premierement, quant les deux armées estoient a lieue et demy, l'une de l'autre, le d^e Conte de Surrey envoya Rouge Croix Poursuivant devers le d^e Roy d'Escosse, luy desirant bataille; a quoy respondit qu'il l'attendroit la jusques au Venredi none. Le s^r de Haward, filz aîné dud. Conte de Surrey, envyron l'heure de onze heures, le ixt jour, passa le pont de Tuissell, avant l'avantgarde et artillerie; et le d^e Conte son pere le suivit, et passa apres, avec l'arrieregarde; et la d^e armée passée, mysdrent icelles en deux batailles, avec 11 Elles chüne bataille.

"Item—a la bataille dud. Roy d'Escosse estoit divisée en cinq batailles, et chüne bataille loing l'un de l'autre, environ unq trait d'arc; et toute cinq estoient avancées sur la bataille des Anglois, aussi loing l'une comme l'autre, en grant trouppéaulx; et partie deulx estoient en quadrans, et autres en maniere de pointe, et estoient sur le haulte d'une montagne, bien a ung quart de myle du pied de la d^e montagne.

"Le seigneur de Haward fist arrester subitement son avantgarde en une petite Vallée, jusques ad ce que l'arrieregarde feust jointe avec l'une des Elles de sa bataille; a dont les deux marcherent tout en ung front, et eulx avansans a l'encontre de l'armée des d. Escossois, lesquels Escossois descendirent la d^e montagne en bonne ordre, en la maniere que marchent les Allemans, sans parler, ne faire aucun bruit.

"Les Contes de Huntley, Arryl, et Crawford, avec leur hoste de viii^m hommes, vindrent sur le v^e de Haward; et en brief de temps furent le d^e Conte, et furent la plus grant partie deulz tuez.

"Le Roy d'Escosse vint, avec un trouppéaulx paisance, sur le d^e Conte de Surrey; lequel Conte avoit a sa main gauche le filz du d^e Haward; et eulx deulx porterent tout les feus de ceste bataille. A laquelle bataille le d^e Roy d'Escosse fut tuz dedens le longueur d'une lance du d. Conte de Surrey; et plusieurs nobles gens y furent tuez, et entre autres prisonniers des Escossois dedens les deux batailles. Et a l'heure de la bataille les Contes de Lyons et de Argille, avec leur trouppéaulx se joignirent a l'un contre de messire Edward Haward, et les d^e Contes et leurs gens furent contrainctz deulz tuz en fuyte.

"Item—Edmond Haward, surnom filz du Conte de Surrey, avoit avec luy mill hommes du pays de Lanqchero et Cheshire, et plusieurs autres gentils hommes de la conté d'York. Et fainct le d^e Conte la droicte Elle du seigneur de Haward son frere, sur lesquels le seigneur Chambellan du Roy d'Escosse, avec plusieurs autres s^r deusent dedens. Maistre Gray, et Mes^r Huntley, deusent prisonniers, et Messire Richard Herbertus tuz, et le d^e Edmond Haward fut tuz fait prisonnier; et vint a son relief le seigneur Darnley avec xv^e hommes; et tellement exploicta quel mist en fuyte les d^e Escossois, et eut envyron * * des gentils hommes Dacres tuez, et en la d^e bataille fut tuz ung grant nombre des d^e Escossois.

"Item—la bataille et descendance commença envyron de quatre a cinq heures apres d'heure, et la chaise continua jusques a demy, on fut merveilleusement grant tuz; et en cest en dix mil tuz davantage, si les Anglois eurenteste a l'heure.

"Item—les Escossois retournent envyron dix mille, et envyron dix mille d'entre de tuz, et les Anglois au desoubz de quatorze.

"Les soldiers ne perdirent pas seulement de quatre a cinq mille chevaulx des d^e Escossois, mais les beulx qui tiroient leur artillerie; et apres vindrent a leur pavillions, et perdirent toutes les estouffes qui estoient dedens, et furent plusieurs des Escossois qui les perdirent.

"L'artillerie d'Escosse et d'Angleterre a esté envoyée, par l'ayde dud. s^r Dacres, en chascun de Etal en Angleterre.

"Le corps du Roy d'Escosse a esté porté a Berwycke. Il ny a guere de gens parvenus du royaume d'Escosse retournes a l'heure, des le Chambellan d'Escosse; et pense l'un que par d'heure tuz demoures en vye.

"Les hommes des nobles batilles d'Escosse qui estoient en la bataille avec le d^e Roy d'Escosse, desquellz on ne oit point parler, eulx furent tuz; fors le seigneur Chambellan dud. Roy d'Escosse.

Conspiracy of Lady Glammiss.

The following account of the charges against this noble lady is abridged from the Appendix to Tytler, vol. v., Letter B.

"Lady Glammiss married, probably about the year 1521, John, sixth Lord of Glammiss. He died on the 8th of August, 1528, in his thirty-seventh year; and, about four months after his death (Dec. 1, 1528), Lady Glammiss was summoned, with Patrick Hume of Blacater, Hugh Kennedy of Gir-

vanmains, and Patrick Charteris, to answer before parliament for having given assistance to the Earl of Angus in convocating the king's lieges for the invasion of his majesty's person. These men were all bold and active partisans of the Douglasses. On September 20, 1529, we find that Lady Glammiss and Patrick Charteris, of Cuthelgurdy, a person who, in the interval, had been indicted to stand his trial for fire-raising and cow-lifting; obtained a letter of license to pass to parts beyond sea, on their pilgrimage, and other lawful business. Whether Patrick and the lady had gone upon their pilgrimage, does not appear, but she did not interrupt her political intrigues, and seems to have been again not only summoned, but found guilty of treason; for, on July 1, 1531, we find that Gavin Hamilton got a gift from the crown of the escheat of all the goods, heritable and moveable, of Janet Lady Glammiss, which had been forfeited on account of her intercommuning with our sovereign lord's rebels, or for any other crimes.

"At this time she appears to have fled from justice, and we lose sight of her for some time; but, on 31st January, 1532, a far darker crime than caballing with rebels, or associating with fire-raisers, was laid to her charge. She was summoned to stand her trial at the Justice Ayre of Forfar, for the poisoning her husband, Lord Glammiss. The crimes of poisoning and witchcraft were then very commonly associated, as may be seen from many interesting trials in Mr. Pitcairn's collections. The great dealers in poisons were witches, and the potency of their drugs was thought to be increased by the charms and incantations with which they were concocted: hence probably the mala fama against Lady Glammiss, as a witch or sorceress. But however this may be, it is certain that, on February 2, and February 26, 1532, Lord Ruthven, Lord Oliphant, with the Lairds of Ardoch, Moncrieff, Tullibardine, and a great many other barons, to the number of twenty-eight, were fined for not appearing to pass upon the Lady Glammiss' jury: and the imperfect and mutilated state of the criminal records of this period, unfortunately, leaves us in the dark as to the future proceedings upon this trial. The probability seems to be, that she was either acquitted, or the charge dropped from want of evidence. If innocent, she was certainly most unfortunate; for, on the 17th of July, 1537, she was, for the fourth time, brought to trial, found guilty of having been art and part in the conspiring the death of the king by poison, and also for her having treasonably assisted Archibald Earl of Angus and George Douglas his brother, who were traitors and rebels. For this crime she was condemned to be burned at the stake, the common mode of death, as Mr. Pitcairn informs us, for all females of rank in cases of treason and murder, and from which he plausibly conjectures that the vulgar opinion of her having been burnt for a witch may have partly arisen. Her son Lord Glammiss, then only sixteen years old, her husband Archibald Campbell, a priest, and a barber named

John Lyon, were tried along with her. The witnesses, as was usual in this cruel age, being examined under the rack, or pynebaukis, Lord Glamis, on his own confession, was found guilty of concealing the conspiracy, and imprisoned till the death of James the Fifth, when he was restored to his estates and honours, upon the ground, that, in the fear of his life, and having the rack before his eyes, he had made a false confession.

That there is any ground on which we may conclude that unprincipled witnesses were brought forward to give false testimony, upon which the jury were compelled to convict her, I cannot admit; still less do I perceive the proceedings to have been characterized by any savage traces of unmanly revenge upon the part of the King. On the other hand, it appears clear that at this time the Douglasses, whose last hope of restoration had been destroyed, began to embrace desperate designs. "The letters of Penman, their secret agent," says Pinkerton (vol. ii. p. 350), "to Sir George Douglas, his employer, betray a malice, and designs the most horrid." "The King is crazed and ill spoken of by his people." "He has begged all Scotland." "All are weary of him." "James shall do the commandment of the Douglasses, God willing." "All hate him and say he must go down." "His glass will soon run out." These diabolical expressions against a prince in the vigour of early life, what can they insinuate but poison or the dagger? Could they be addressed to a person who did not seal them with approbation? And could a more fit or secret agent than a sister be employed to promote the interests of her family at any risk?" If the reader will turn to Piteairn's Criminal Trials, p. 190, and read the names of the jurymen who gave the verdict against her, he will scarcely admit the idea of her being innocent; and it is worthy of notice, that instead of having the least appearance of its being a packed jury, some of the leading men amongst them were friends and near connexions of the Douglasses. John Earl of Athol, one of the jury, married Janet, a sister of that Master of Forbes who suffered for treason at the same time as Lady Glamis, and who was a supporter of the Douglasses.—(Douglas Peerage, p. 141, vol. i.) Robert lord Maxwell, another of the jury, it is well known was intimately connected with the Douglasses. He married a daughter of Douglas Drumlanrig (Douglas, vol. ii. p. 317), and his daughter, Margaret Maxwell, was afterwards married to Archibald Earl of Angus, brother to Lady Glamis. William, Master of Glencairn, a third jurymen, was also nearly related to the Douglasses, and constantly of their party. His mother was Marjory, a daughter of Archibald, fifth Earl of Angus, a sister of Gawin Douglas, the celebrated translator of Virgil, and a grand aunt of the Earl of Angus, and of Lady Glamis. Are we to believe that these men violated their oaths, and found guilty, upon false evidence, an innocent and noble lady, in whose favour they must have felt a strong bias.

Sentence pronounced upon Patrike Hamelin.

"Christi nomine invocato. We know, by the mercy of God, Archbishop of Saint Andrew, Primate of Scotland, with the honorable, devout, and authoritative of the most reverent Bishops, Cardinals, and Lordes, Abbottes, Doctors of Theologie, professors of the holy Scriptures and students of the Uniuersitie, assembling us for the tyme, sitting in judgement within our metropolitan Church of S. Andrew, in the case of heretick practices, agaynst M. Patrike Hamelin, Abbot or priorarie of Ferme, being summoned to appear before vs, to answer to certayne Articles offered, taught, and preached by hym, and in opposing before vs, and accused, the merites of the cause being simply weyde, discussed, and understood by lawful inquisition made in Last last parlements we have founde the same M. Patrike, many wayes infected wyth heresie, disputing, holding, and maintayning diuers heresies of Martin Luther, and Iohannes repugnant to our fayth, and which is already condemned by generall Councils and most famous Uniuersities. And he being vnder the same sentence we decernyng before, hym to be examined and accused vpon the premises, he of will vnyde (he may be presumed) passed to other parts, parts of the Realme, suspected and vnyde of heresie. And being lately returned, hee being examined, but of his owne head, without licence or knowledge, hath presumed to preach wicked heresies. We have found also, that he hath affirmed, published, and taught diuers opinions of Luthers, and wicked heresies, after that he was summoned to appear before vs and our counsaill. That our sentence be free wyll: That none is to stirre no long as he lyueth: That children baptizmed after their baptisme, are sinners: All Christians, that be worthy to be called Christians, do knowe that they are in grace: No man is justified by works, but by faith onely: Good workes make not a good man, but a good man doth make good workes. That by faith, hope, and charitie, are we knit, that he that hath the one, hath the rest, and he that wanteth the one of them wanteth the rest. And with diuers other heresies and detestable opinions, and hath presumed so obstinate in the same, that by so muche his perswasion, he may be drawn, therefore, in the way of our right fayth. All these premises being considered, we haue God and the integrity of our fayth before our eyes, and following the counsaill and aduise of the professors of the holy Scriptures, men of law, and others, sitting vs for the tyme, do pronounce, determine, and decerne, the said M. Patrike Hamelin, for his aforesaid, wickedness, and maintayning of the forsayd heresies, and his pertinacitie (they being excommunicated, contrary by the Church, generall Councils, and most famous Uniuersities), to be an hereticke, and as such condemned and punished, like as we haue done and define hym to be punished, by this our sentence definitiue, depriuyng and senteneyng hym, to be deprived of all dignities, honours, orders, offices, and benefices of the Church: and therefore do iudge and pronounce him to be deliuered ouer to the secular power, to be punished, and his goodes to be confiscate.

"This our sentence definitiue, was geuen and read at our Metropolitan Church of S. Andrewes, the last day of the moneth of February, an. 1527, beyng present, the most reuerend fathers in Christ and Lordes: Gawand, Byshop of Glasgow; George, Byshop of Dunkelden; Iohn, Byshop of Brecham; William, Byshop of Dunblane; Patrike, Prior of Saint Andrew; David, Abbott of Abirbrothok; George, Abbot of Dunfermlyng; Alexander, Abbot of Cumbuskyneth; Henry, Abbot of Lendors; Iohn, Prior of Pettynweme; the Deane and Sub-Deane of Glasgow; M. Hew Spens, Thomas Ramsay, Allane Meldrum, &c. In the presence of the clergy and the people."

Copy of a Letter congratulatory sent from the Doctors of Louane to the Archbishop of St. Andrew's and Doctors of Scotland, commending them for the death of M. Patrick Hamilton.

"Your excellent vertue (most honourable Bishop) hath so deserved, that albeit we be farre distant, both by sea and land, without coniunction of familiaritie, yet we desire with all our hartes, to thanke you for your worthy deede, by whose workes, that true faith which, not long ago, was tainted with heresie, not onely remaineth vnhurt, but also is more confirmed. For as our deare friend, M. Alexander Galoway, Chanon of Aberdon, hath shewed vs, the presumption of the wicked hereticke Patrike Hamelton, which is expressed in this your example, in that you haue cut him of, when there was no hope of amendement, &c. The which thyng, as it is thought commendable to vs, so the maner of the procedyng was no lesse pleasant, that the matter was performed by so great consent of so many estates, as of the clergy, nobility, and vulgare people, not rashely, but most prudently, the order of law beyng in all poynts obserued. We haue sene the sentence which ye pronounced, and alway do approue the same, not doubtyng but that the Articles which be inserted, are erroneous, so that whosoever wil defend for a truth, any one of the same, with pertinacitie, should be esteemed an enemy to the fayth, and an aduersary to the holy Scripture. And albeit one or two of them appeare to be without errour, to them that will consider onely the bare wordes: as (for example) good workes make not a good man, but a good man worketh good workes, yet there is no doubt, but they containe a Lutheran sense, which, in a maner, they signifie: to witte, that workes done after fayth, and justification, make not a man the better, nor are worthy of any reward before God. Belcue not, that this example shall have place onely among you, for there shall be among externe nations, which shall imitate the same, &c. Certainly, ye haue geuen vs great courage, so that now we acknowledge your Vniuersitie, which was founded accordyng to the example of our Vniuersitie of Louane, to be equal to ours, or else aboue, and would God occasion were offered of testifying our myndes towards you. In the mean tyme, let vs labour with one consent, that the rauenyng Wolues may be expelled from the shepefeld of Christ, while we haue tyme. Let vs study to preach to the people more learnedly hereafter, and more wisely. Let vs haue Inquisitours, and espyers of booke, containyng that doctrine, especially that is brought in from farre countreys, whether by apostatiue Monkes, or by Marchauntes, the most suspected kynde of men in these dayes. It is sayd, that since Scotland first embraced the Christian fayth, it was neuer defiled with any heresie.

"Perseuer, therefore, beyng moued thereunto by the example of England, your next neighbour, which in this most troublous tyme, is not chaunged, partly by the workyng of the Byshops, among the which Boffensis hath shewed hymselfe an Evangelicall Phoenix, and partly of the Kyng, declaryng hymselfe to be an other Mathias of the new law: pretermittyng nothyng that may defend the law of his realme. The which, if your most renowned Kyng of Scotland will follow, he shall purchase to hymselfe eternal glory. Further, as touchyng the condigne commendation, due for your part (most Reuerend Byshop) in this Behalfe, it shal not be the least part of your prayse, that these heresies haue bene extinct sometymes in Scotland, you beyng Primate of Scotland and principal author thereof. Albeit that they also which haue assisted you, are not to be defrauded of their deserved prayse, as the Reuerend Byshop of Glasgow, of whose erudition we haue here geuen vs partly to understand, and also the Reuerend Byshop of Aberden, a stoute defender of the fayth, together with the rest of the Prelates, Abbots, Priours, and professors of holy Scripture. Let your reuerend fatherhode take this lette testificate of our duty toward you, in good part, whom we wish long and happily well to fare in Christ. From Louane, an. 1528, April 21.

"By the Maisters and Professours of Theologie in the Vniuersitie of Louane. Yours to command."—Fox's Martyrs.

Perfidy of the Scottish Nobles.

The letters relating to this period, which Mr. Tytler has discovered in the State Paper Office, clearly prove that the leading Scottish nobles had shamefully betrayed the cause of their country, and sold themselves to the English. Sir George Douglas, as a reward for the services mentioned in the text stipulated—1st. "To have one thousand pounds sterling within eleven days to support himself, friends, and strengths against the authority, and to have a yearly stipend of five hundred pounds sterling. 2nd. His friends not to be opprest. 3rd. That he may have his goods, silver, money, plate, and apparel that he left in his hostess' house in Berwick delivered to him. 4th. To have from the English king the keeping of the fort at Eyemouth." A letter from the Earl of Angus, his brother, to Sir Andrew Dudley, the English governor of the fort of Broughty, shows that nobleman to have been equally venal and treacherous. Sir Andrew addressed a letter to the Protector, informing him that he had opened secret negotiations with Argyle "to be a favourer of the king's godly purpose, and to take the king's majesty's part in the same; on which communing the Lord Gray borrowed one thousand crowns of me to give the Earl of Argyle to make him the more earnest in the same. * * * The Lord Gray putteth no doubt but that for a pension and a certain sum of money your Grace shall win him to the king's majesty's godly purpose, and to be an earnest setter forth of the same." And Huntley, in a letter to the Protector, dated Newcastle, 20th of March, says, "Your grace shall be sure of such service as I may do to the furthering of the king's majesty's affairs in all sorts as your grace will command, as my duty is. * * * And further your grace may command me; and in what place I may do best service shall be aye ready at your grace's charge."

Martyrdom of Thomas Forret.

The official accuser in court on this occasion was a servile creature of Beaton's, Mr. John Lauder, between whom and Forret the following dialogue took place:—

"Accuser.—False heretic! Thou sayest it is not lawful to Kirkmen to take their teinds (tythes) and offerings and corps-presents, though we have been in use of them, constitute by the Kirk and King, and also our holy father, the Pope, hath confirmed to the same?"

"Dean Forret.—Brother, I said not so, but I said it was not lawful to Kirkmen to spend the patrimony of the Kirk as they do, as on riotous feasting and on fair women, and at playing at cards and dice; and neither the Kirk well maintained nor the people instructed in God's Word, nor the sacraments duly administered to them as Christ commanded.

"Accuser.—Dare thou deny that which is openly known in the country? That thou gave again to the parishioners the cow and the upmost cloths, saying you had no right to them?"

"Dean Forret.—I gave them again to them that had more mister (need) than I.

"Accuser.—Thou false heretic! Thou learned all thy parishioners to say the Paternoster, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments in English, which is contrary to our acts, that they should know what they say.

"Dean Forret.—Brother, my people are so rude and ignorant they understand no Latin, so that my conscience moved me to pity their ignorance, which provoked me to learn them the words of their salvation in English, and the Ten Commandments, which are the law of God, whereby they might observe the same. I taught the Bishop, whereby they might know their faith in God, and Jesus Christ his son, and of his death and resurrection. Moreover, I taught them and learned from the Lord's own prayer in the mother tongue, to the effect that they should know to whom they should pray, and in whose name they should pray, and what they should ask and desire in prayer, which I believe to be the pattern of all prayer.

"Accuser.—Why did you that? By our acts and ordinances of our holy father the Pope?"

"Dean Forret.—I follow the acts of our Master and Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Apostle Paul, who saith in his doctrine to the Corinthians, that he had rather speak the words to the understanding and edifying of his people, than to stand in a strange tongue, which they understood not.

"Accuser.—Where finds thou that?"

"Dean Forret.—In my book here in my arms.

"Upon which the accuser starting with a laugh to the vicar pulled the book out of his hand, and holding it up to the people, said with a loud voice, 'Behold, sirs, he has the book of heresy in his sleeve, that makes all the deils and play-men deil.'

"'Brother,' said the vicar, 'God forgive you, you could say better, if ye pleased, use to call the Book of the Evangel of Jesus Christ the book of heresy! I assure you, dear brethren, that there is nothing in this book but the life, the law, will and testament of our Master and Saviour Jesus Christ, penned by the four Evangelists for our wholesome instruction and comfort.'

"The accuser, interrupting him, 'Eh, then not, heretic, that it is contrary to our acts and express commands, to have a New Testament in English, which is enough to make thee deil.'

"Then the council of the clergy gave sentence on him to be burnt for the heresy and using of the same book—the New Testament—in English. For these and the like sentences, was he taken up to the Castlehill in Edinburgh, and next morning publicly burnt. The bodies of these two men appear to have been strangled before they were consumed to ashes.—Anderson's Journal of the English Bible, p. 800.

Erections of the Clergy.

Letter from the Earl of Angus to his brother:—
"The King is not in the town himself, and very few temporal lords. At the making of this writing (certain articles), the King was at Greenlaw, in Clydesdale, and sent his writing to Edinburgh to the clergy. The bearers were the James Hamilton, Nicol of Crawford, and Mr. James Forret. These were the points of the King's charge to I was advertised—bidding the clergy give up the corps-present and the spent stick through all Scotland, that they should be no more taken; and that every man should have his own teind (tythe), paying for his tythes such like as he pays to his landlord of his maills (rents), and no more, for his whole tythes. Sir James and the other two said to the clergy, if they granted not that at the King's command, that there should be a charge laid to them, that he would ger (make) them set all the temporals that the Kirk have, to feu (fee), and to have for it but the old rent such as the old rentals bear. The Kirkmen of Scotland were never so ill content."—Anderson's Annals of the English Bible, p. 448.

NOTE HH (XX.), p. 615.

Ferocity of the War between England and Scotland.

This fact is strikingly illustrated by a paper entitled Memorial for Edward Atkinson, alias Bluemantle, sent by the protector to the governor of Scotland. This document states, "that after having obtained audience. the said Bluemantle, putting on his coat of arms, and making reverence to him (the governor), without any other salutation, shall boldly say as ensueth:—The substance is, that understanding that sundry the king's majesty's his grace's sovereign lord's subjects and servants, born within the realm of Scotland, have now a good while, and yet do, according to their bounden duty, serve his majesty in these wars, the governor had published a proclamation, commanding, that if any Scotsman so serving shall be taken in the field bearing arms against him, they shall not be used as prisoners, but immediately put to death as rebels. Bluemantle is enjoined to demand this proclamation to be immediately recalled, otherwise 'all Scottish prisoners, of whatever rank they be, shall be put to death as soon as they are taken.' This paper is followed by a 'Minute of a Proclamation for not taking of Scottishmen, dated 22d May, 1549.' It commences thus: 'Edward by the grace of God, &c., * * * Whereas the Earl of Arran, pretending himself to be Governor of Scotland,' and goes on to speak of the people of Scotland, not acknowledging, or giving obedience to 'their superior and sovereign lord the King's majesty of England, in consequence of which the countries are at war, and Scotland grievously afflicted with slaughter and devastation, as with a just plague of God.' It then proceeds thus:—'Not content with all this, the governor hath devised a most cruel, unnatural, and deadly proclamation, that every Scotsman serving the King of England, should be slain as soon as taken, by means of which some of his majesty's subjects, Scotsmen born, have been put to open and cruel death.' Therefore, it continues, 'that cruelty may be punished, and repelled with cruelty;' he, the protector, straightly commands all his highness's wardens, deputy-wardens, officers, &c., that they do not from henceforth take any Scotsman serving against his highness in the field, but do kill the same out of hand without ransoming them, until the Governor Arran have revoked his proclamation, under penalty of death, if this is disobeyed."—Tytler, Appendix to vol. vi. No. V.

No wonder that such vindictive proceedings led the Scottish Borderers to make dreadful retaliation for the injuries they had sustained. An idea may be conceived of this horrid warfare, from the memoirs of Beaugué, a French officer serving in Scotland. The Castle of Fernihirst, situated about three miles above Jedburgh, had been taken and garrisoned by the English. The commander and his followers are accused of such excesses of lust and cruelty, "as would," says Beaugué, "have made to tremble the most savage Moor in Africa." A band of Frenchmen, with the Laird of Fernihirst and his Borderers, assaulted this fortress. The English archers showered their arrows down the steep ascent leading to the castle, and from the outer wall by which it was surrounded. A vigorous escalade, however, gained the base court, and the sharp fire of the French arquebusiers drove the bowmen into the square keep, or dungeon, of the fortress. Here the English defended themselves till a breach in the wall was made by mining. Through this hole the commandant crept forth, and surrendering himself to De la Mothe-rouge, implored protection from the vengeance of the Borderers. But a Scottish Marchman, eyeing in the captive the ravisher of his wife, approached him e'er the French officer could guess his intention, and, at one blow, carried his head four paces from the trunk. Above a hundred Scots rushed to wash their hands in the blood of their oppressor, banded about the severed head, and expressed their joy in such shouts, as if they had stormed the City of London. The prisoners who fell into their merciless hands were put to death, after their eyes had been torn out; the victors contending who should display the greatest address in severing their legs and arms, before inflicting a mortal wound. When their own prisoners were slain, the Scottish, with an unextinguishable thirst for blood, purchased those of the French; parting willingly with their very arms, in exchange for an English captive. "I myself," says Beaugué, with military sang-froid, "I myself sold them a prisoner for a small horse. They laid him down upon the ground, galloped over him with their lances in rest, and wounded him as they passed. When slain, they cut his body in pieces, and bore the mangled gobbets, in triumph, on the points of their spears. I cannot greatly praise the Scottish for this practice. But the truth is, that the English tyrannized over the Borders in a most barbarous manner; and I think it was but fair to repay them, according to the proverb, in their own coin."—Border Minstrelsy, vol. i. pp. 127—129.

NOTE II (XXI.), p. 760.

Mr. Tytler's charge against John Knox of being priy to the Murder of Riccio.

The following able and most satisfactory refutation of the charge which Mr. Tytler has brought against the Scottish Reformer, is extracted from the North British Review, vol. iv.

“Mr. Tytler first favours us with a letter from the Earl of Bedford, the governor of Berwick, to Cecil, the minister of Elizabeth, in which he, among other information as to the murder, states, that as ‘Mr. Randolph writeth also more at large of the names of such as now be gone abroad, I shall not trouble you therewith.’ (Vol. vii. p. 354.) Randolph at this period was resident at Berwick, and not in Edinburgh; and the letter referred to by Bedford, accordingly follows. It is dated the 21st March, 1565-6; and in the body of this letter, Randolph gives the list of names in the following terms:—

“The lords of the last attempt, which were these—Morton, Ruthven, Lindsay, and Ledington, besides these that were the principal takers in hand of this matter, there are also these—the Laird of Ormiston, Hawton, his son-in-law, Cawder, his nephew, Brunsden, Whyttingham, Andrew Car, of Fawlside, Justice-Clerk’s brother, George Douglas, and some other; of the town of Edinburgh divers.’ (Vol. vii. p. 355.)

“This is the list of Randolph, and in it Knox’s name does not appear; but Mr. Tytler found a piece of paper pinned to the letter, with some names written in some unknown hand, which he says was the list Randolph was to send. Now, here we humbly confess ourselves unable to follow Mr. Tytler. We have in Randolph’s letter—in the body of it, and in his own handwriting—a precise, definite list, which would be without any meaning at all, if the loose slip of paper was also to be held as the list. This separate paper is not mentioned, moreover, as having been sent along with the letter—it is not written by Bedford or Randolph, or by any secretary of Randolph’s; but, according to Mr. Tytler, it must have been by some clerk of Bedford’s, whom Randolph must have hired for the occasion. There is not the slightest evidence that it was seen by either of the ministers. The whole bond of connexion between it and their letter is the pin, just as the sole connexion between one part of Mr. Tytler’s argument and the rest is the binding. That it was written by Bedford’s clerk, we have nothing but Mr. Tytler’s guess as proof. It is an anonymous, unauthenticated, nameless scrap of paper, gathered from a mass of similar rubbish, to be rendered by Mr. Tytler powerful enough to annihilate the concurring testimony of all contemporary history.

“From all this, however, Mr. Tytler maintains, that ‘the inference is inevitable.’ John Knox, in “an authentic list,” is described as privy to the murder. Having thus doggedly pronounced his decree, Mr. Tytler declines an examination of the list, with the view of ascertaining if it be consistent with other acknowledged facts, or even with itself. It contains, however, several blunders in the only two lines of narrative with which it favours us. It professes to be “a list of names of such as were consenting to the death of David,” which is totally contrary to the character of the list which Randall said Randolph was to send, for it was only to contain ‘the names of such as be gone abroad,’—a description which might apply to Knox, as he left Edinburgh on the queen’s return from Douglas. There are only sixteen names given; but in the appendix to Keith, there is a list of those charged by the Privy Council as having been accessory to the crime, amounting in number to seventy-two; and in Pitcairn’s Criminal Trials, there will be found thirty more. This is the first error, though it is not the greatest. It resembles well informing us that ‘all these were at the death of David, and privy thereto, and are now in displeasure with the queen, and their houses taken and spoiled.’ Here there are two gross mistakes. We never before heard it whispered, that either John Knox or John Craig was ‘at the death.’ Crawford and Blackwood, though they covered this part of history with the most impudent fabrications, never crowned them by one like this; and Mr. Tytler’s caution came to his aid; he will not believe the plain statements of his own authority, and he drops short of the charge, that Knox gave one of the fifty-three wounds. The paper is, however, so valuable to be rejected as unworthy of notice; it merely contains an error, and must be understood to mean, ‘that all these were at the death of David, or privy thereto.’ After the crack has thus been soldered, another yawn, when we are informed, that the houses of all the persons named, were ‘taken and spoiled.’ This is an extraordinary error as regards Craig, who remained in Scotland all the time, labouring in his vineyard; and we cannot in any authority, printed or unprinted, find the slightest warrant for saying that such a law overtook the establishment of Knox.

“Mr. Tytler expends great industry in establishing that Randolph and Tytler were both in the full knowledge of all the facts relative to the conspiracy. Here also he is very false. With regard to inconsistency, while he maintains the truth of the list, on the ground that ‘these two persons, the Earl of Bedford and Randolph, were intimately acquainted with the whole details of the conspiracy’ (vol. vii. p. 300.) again, in the following page, he makes another wobble, and after adopting his own list, because it was written ‘after the arrival of Lord Ruthven,’ he rejects a list in which we shall immediately refer (which, with the name of Knox), because ‘the chief particulars of both account and list were Morton and Ruthven.’ (Vol. vii. p. 301.) That there was not the chief authorities shall be immediately shown; but, in the meantime, we rather think Mr. Tytler is more at home in describing doubtful names than in chopping logic. It appears, from all the evidence we possess, to be perfectly essential that neither Randolph nor Bedford knew anything of the details of the conspiracy, except what they derived from the flying reports of the refugees who were daily flocking to Berwick. This can be clearly established, without relying upon any statements we might draw from Mr. Tytler's language. Besides the list contained in the body of Randolph's letter of 21st March, and the scrap of paper which Mr. Tytler found pinned to that letter, there exists a third list, not written by a clerk, not unsubscribed, not unauthenticated, but in the handwriting of Randolph himself, and authenticated by the subscriptions of him and Bedford; and in this list also the name of Knox does not occur. This list was sent on the 27th of March, with a minute account of the conspiracy, to the Council of England, and after every means had been adopted for arriving at the truth. We have this important document printed elsewhere than in Mr. Tytler's history.

"From it, it appears that both Randolph and Bedford were in the dark in regard to the whole matter, and resorted to every expedient to collect information. They state that, 'hearing of so many matters as we do, and finding such variety in the reports, we have much ado to discern the verity, which maketh us the slower and loather to put anything in writing.' (This uncertainty as to facts, be it observed, existed no less than six days after Mr. Tytler's famous 'authentic list' is said to have been sent off by Bedford's clerk to London.) The writers then state, that 'we would that your honours, and by you the queen's majesty, our sovereign, should be advertised but of the very truth, as near as we can possible.' How did they proceed? 'To this end, we thought good to send up Captain Carewe, who was in Edinburgh at the time of the last attempt, who spoke there with diverse, and after that with the queen's self and her husband.' Thus, therefore, on the 27th of March, eighteen days after the murder, when the usual exaggerations and falsehoods that attend the first report of a startling event had died away, and when the English ministers had derived their information from the sure source of a special envoy, they sat down to write a deliberate account 'of the very truth.' 'Willing to our utmost part to inform you of the truth.' We beg attention to the data on which their statement is founded, on account of a perversion of fact by Mr. Tytler. They distinctly state that their information is 'conform to that which we have learned by others, and known by his, Captain Carewe's report; we find the same confirmed by the parties selves that were there present, and assistants unto those that were executors of the deed.' (Ellis's Letters, vol. ii. p. 208.) In defiance of this explicit declaration, that 'the chief authorities' were authentic statements made by the special commissioner and others, 'confirmed' merely by Morton and Ruthven, we have Mr. Tytler, for a purpose of his own, risking the extraordinary assertion (we will not characterise it more severely) that Morton and Ruthven were the 'chief authorities.' The object of this is to take away from the list the character of being impartial, by rendering it entirely the work of Morton and Ruthven, who, Mr. Tytler again most gratuitously, and without a shadow of evidence, tells us, wished, with Roman generosity, to screen Knox by sacrificing themselves. In this list of the 27th March, we have 'the names of such as were doers, and of counsel in this last attempt.' Mr. Tytler accordingly very naturally cross-examines himself in the following style:—'Why do you reject the evidence of this second list, and why are we not to believe this solemn declaration, absolving the ministers of Scotland, and of course Knox with them, from all participation in the murder?' (Vol. vii. p. 340.) His answer to this sensible question, and the reply of his opponent, reminds one of the remark of Bishop Horne, that 'by the writers of dialogues matters are often contrived, as in the combats of the Emperor Commodus, in his gladiatorial capacity, where the antagonist of his imperial majesty was allowed only a leaden weapon.' He first asserts that Randolph and Bedford, in direct contradiction to their own averment, oftentimes repeated in their letter, made up the list under the dictation of Morton and Ruthven, and that these two worthies had some inexplicable interest to conceal Knox's concern in the transaction. That they had any such interest, farther than the interest of truth, we again affirm to be destitute of proof, and invented solely to meet the exigencies of Mr. Tytler's argument. Again, Mr. Tytler, not feeling secure on this point, makes another gratuitous assertion, when he says that Randolph would be more precise on delicate matters in his private letter to Cecil of the 21st March, sending the scrap of paper (assuming that he sent it, of which there is no evidence), than he and Bedford would be to the Council, in their letter of the 27th. That they felt any such delicacy is also contradicted by the very letter in question; for, in mentioning the insinuations against Mary's honour, they write in the margin thus:—

"It is our parts to pass this over in silence, rather than to make any such rehearsal of things committed unto us in secret; but we know to whom we write.—Ellis, vol. ii. p. 229, note.

"But, secondly, Mr. Tytler having thus argued that the list of the 27th March was concocted at Berwick, by Randolph, Bedford, Morton, and Ruthven, absolutely forgets what he had written, flounders into a new contradiction, and transfers the locus delicti and the culprits to London, where he makes Cecil, 'the secretary of Elizabeth, modify and recast the story, after the failure of the conspiracy, and with the approbation and by the directions of Elizabeth.' (Vol. vii. p. 360.) One of these arguments must be false. It is clear that the very same act could not be done at Berwick and at London, and that, too, by different people. On the authority of the Italian manuscript which Mr. Tytler cites, he may maintain à l'outrance, if it please him, that Cecil concocted the most enormous falsehoods on the subject; but it is absolutely amazing how he imagines that, in consequence of this, Cecil had prepared the list of the 27th March, when that very list itself now lies in the British Museum, patent to all the world, and, as he himself states, 'in the handwriting of Randolph!'

“So much for this third list. We now come to a fourth, as contained in another letter by Randolph. He here informs us that ‘there are privy in Scotland these — Moray, Rothes, Orange, myself.’ (Tytler, vol. vii. p. 25.) The name of Knox does not here occur, nor does it in the fifth list, preserved in the appendix to Keith. But this is not all, Morton and Ruthven wrote from Berwick a letter of their own to Cecil, in which they say that—

“‘It is come to our knowledge that some Papists have bruited that these our proceedings have been at the instigation of the ministers of Scotland. We assure your lordship, upon our honour, that there were none of the mart nor part of that deed, nor were participate thereof.’—Tytler, vol. vii. p. 360.

“Mr. Tytler again puts himself through the catechism. ‘Why not believe Morton? Where is Ruthven, when he states upon his word of honour that none of the ministers of Scotland were art and part of that deed?’ He answers, that Morton did not know the meaning of art and part of the king’s murder, though he admitted foreknowledge of it. But, if this be the case, what does the other statement, that none of the ministers were participate in the murder mean? and, in order to render this absurd, hypercritical argument effectual, be it observed that it is necessary to leave out of view that the letter is not Morton’s only, but the joint production of him and Ruthven; and that the latter must have been equally obtuse in matters of philology. There are still, however, some arguments remaining, which we ask indulgence for examining also, as the matter involves so much the credit of an illustrious name.

“‘Another corroboration,’ says Mr. Tytler, ‘of his accession to this conspiracy was his precipitate flight from Edinburgh, with the rest of the conspirators, upon the threatened advance of the queen to the city. Knox fled precipitately, and in extreme agony of spirit, to Kyle; and, as we have already seen, did not venture to return till the noblemen rose against the queen, after the death of Darnley. If he was not implicated, why did he take guilt to himself by flight?’ (Vol. vii. p. 359.) Here is an extreme and ludicrous rapidity in a conclusion, which is neither morally just, nor consistent with the facts. Flight by Knox before the queen, marching on Edinburgh at the head of troops, was only a common measure of prudence in his position. We have already seen that he frequently came into collision with Mary, and that her exasperation had reached such a point, that she declared before her Council—‘I vow to God, I shall be once revenged.’ (Knox, p. 359.) At this very time, too, he was a proscribed and marked man, and the very first person to be seized during the licence of military misrule. In that old contemporary diary, titled A Diurnal of Occurrents, which Mr. Tytler estimates so highly, we are informed that, ‘upon the 19th day of August, the king [Darnley] came to St. Giles’ Kirk, and Johne Knoxe preachit; quhairat he was erabbit, and causit discharge the said Johne of his preitching.’

“Knox being thus prevented from discharging duty, it appears that he applied to the General Assembly, which met on 25th December. ‘An license to peace to England,’ because ‘the execution of his ministrie in Edinburgh was suspended’ (Calderwood, vol. ii. p. 349); and to this request the Assembly acceded, on condition that he returned before the following June; now, seeing that Knox was in Edinburgh on the 23d of March, when Riccio was murdered, two months after the Assembly had sat, it is doubtful whether he had gone to the south. At all events, this is clear, that Knox was idle in Edinburgh, and labouring under the marked displeasure of the court, and therefore, of all others, the first person that would have been summarily dealt with on the occasion of an irruption of undisciplined troops into the city. On all these facts Mr. Tytler has, however, kept a guarded and discreet silence.

“He has also been mute as to the mode in which the queen’s forces fulfilled the worst anticipations of the refugees. The Diurnal of Occurrents informs us, that they recklessly entered the houses of the citizens, spoiled them of their goods, and, without a shadow of suspicion, hurled them to prison. Randolph and Biddel set out, that ‘diverse of the towne folk, honest men, were committed to prison, and diverse escaped’ (Ibid. vol. ii. p. 233); and ‘the worst of it was, as called the Frenchmen, their wives were taken as well’ (Ibid.) This is further confirmed by David Buchanan, who wrote the 6th book of Knox’s History: ‘In the execution of the same of our committed great outrages in breaking up houses, thrusting themselves into every house. (Knox, p. 354.) Many of the poor burghers fled from the city in terror. Two of them thus describe their story—

“‘They were in their own houses at supper ignorant of the thing attempted, until the common bell rang, at which time we passed in company with the provost, as many more did, to the street, and that same night returned again and passed in our beds, within our own houses. Thus in the plain and simple truth of our pains. Although this was all the concern in which our sister and cordiner had with the matter, they saw that they, for fear, absented themselves, and so were put to the horn,’—a protesting voice amongst against Knox.—Pitcairn’s Crime, Tract, p. 492.

“So much as to Knox taking guilt to himself by flight. We come now to Mr. Tytler’s argument drawn from the opinion Knox is said to have expressed when the deed was done, by Mr. Tytler will not rely upon the ‘ambiguity’ of his being absolutely conclusive. He quotes a passage from the fifth book of Knox’s History, where the death of Riccio is thus spoken of—

“‘After this manner above specified, to wit, by the death of David Riccio, the multitude were relieved of their trouble, and returned in their peace and rowmes, and likewise the church returned, and all that professed the straight within this realm, after fasting and prayer, were delivered.’

"Now it is matter of notorious fact, that the fifth book of the volume, which goes under the name of Knox's History of the Reformation, was not written by him; and if this be the case, why should the historian drag in a passage written by another hand full sixty years after the grass was growing green upon his grave? Why should Knox be made responsible for the reflections of David Buchanan, with which that worthy gentleman enlightened the world in the following age? Knox himself expressly states, in incidentally referring to the death of Riecio, and declining to tell the story, that 'he refers it to such as God shall raise up to the same.' As the force of all this could not be disputed, Mr. Tytler endeavours to implicate the Reformer by insinuating that the statement might be found 'in his notes and collections;' for which, however, we have only the worn-out authority of the historian's imagination, which can never take a flight except in one direction.

"On the return of the queen from Dunbar, the Privy Council was immediately convened, in order to bring down upon the murderers the punishment of the laws. Their directions on this head were of the most sweeping description:—'The lords think expedient, that all that were of the device, council, or actually at the committing of the slaughter, shall be prosecuted by order of justice.' (Keith, App. p. 131.) Accordingly, seventy-one persons were put to 'the horn,' which, we understand, involved the pains and infamy of rebellion. And, in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, we find that during the succeeding months of April, May, June, and July, this indiscriminate blistering of the lieges was kept up. (Pitcairn, vol. ii. p. 283, seq.) High and low, rich and poor, were denounced; cordiners and cutlers in the Canongate, residents in Muscelburgh and Dalkeith, were all involved in the indiscriminate forfeitures. Suspicion, in nearly all cases, was the ground of charge; and hence the simple, obvious, but important question, why was Knox not denounced, seeing that 'he took guilt to himself by flight?'—seeing that he was at the moment suffering a punishment imposed upon him by the king, who, in disclosing the names of all the other conspirators, would not surely overlook the man who had on other points displeased him? Was it not because no such interpretation was put upon his conduct by those who had every wish to put it, and because the breath of slander had not, in his own day, dimmed the lustre of his name?

"The last argument we now approach—and it fortunately is one which may be disposed of in a sentence. There was a religious fast held in Edinburgh during the week on which the murder was perpetrated, and which, Mr. Tytler tells us, the ministers took advantage of, in order to preach fiery sermons suited to the times. It is clear that their motive in this was to prepare the public mind for the coming tragedy. Unfortunately for Mr. Tytler, however, it is upon record that this fast was ordained to be celebrated by the General Assembly of the Church, which had three months previously closed its sittings. The subjects of exhortation were expressly stated; a regular treatise for the fast was prepared; and, with general directions to apply their sermons to sins of all times, they were specially to have in view the calamitous position of the country at that period, by the banishment of the Protestant lords, the open celebration of the mass, the danger that threatened the existence of the church, and the insecurity in which the whole Protestant community was placed by the queen's accession to the Bayonne League. These were the causes that induced the ministers so to preach. These are the reasons assigned by our historians, until we come down to Goodall, who first put upon it a sinister interpretation (vol. i. p. 248), which 'my grandfather' copied, and which the grandson has again transcribed verbatim et literatim.

"All contemporary history—all the private correspondence of the age of Knox—is silent on the subject of his accession to the murder. We have examined every printed treatise on the subject, and many of the MSS. that still exist, and in not one of the laboured journals, or didactic histories of either enemies or friends—in not one of the numerous letters written for private perusal, and uninfluenced by any sinister purpose, have we been able to find one single inuendo or insinuation to corroborate the tale.

"Thus, therefore, with all this body of overpowering and invincible negative evidence, we have four distinct lists of the murderers or their accessories, in none of which does the name of Knox appear, set in opposition to a miserable rag of paper, unsubscribed, unauthenticated, referred to in no letter, author unknown, date in nubibus—in short, without one single element of that evidence on which human opinion rests, and without one single recommendation to induce us to treat it with respect, or to give it credibility."
